> Sacrifice to "the mob," O poet! Sacrifice to that unfortunate, disinherited, vanquished, vagabond, shoeless, famished, repudiated, despairing mob; sacrifice to it, if it must be, and when it must be, thy repose, thy fortune, thy joy, thy country, thy liberty, thy life. The mob is the human race in misery. The mob is the mournful beginning of the people. The mob is the great victim of darkness. Sacrifice to it! Sacrifice thyself! Let thyself be hunted, let thyself be exiled like Voltaire to Ferney, like D'Aubigne to Geneva, like Dante to Verona, like Juvenal to Syene, like Tacitus to Methymna, like Æschylus to Gela, like John to Patmos, like Elijah to Horeb, like Thucydides to Thrace, like Isaiah to Ezion-geber! Sacrifice to the mob; sacrifice to it thy gold, and thy blood which is more than thy gold, and thy thought which is more than thy blood, and thy love which is more than thy thought; sacrifice to it everything except justice. Receive its complaint; listen to it touching its faults and the faults of others; hear its accusation. Giv it thy ear, thy hand, thy arm, thy heart. Do everything for it excepting evil. Alas! it suffers so much, and it knows nothing. Correct it, warn it, instruct it, guide it, train it. Make it spell truth, show it the alphabet of reason, teach it to read virtue, probity, generosity, mercy. Hold thy book wide open. Be there, attentiv, vigilant, kind, faithful, humble. Light up the brain, inflame the mind, extinguish selfishness; and thyself giv the example.

"The Lady of the Club."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Please accept my hearty thanks for publishing the story furnished by Helen Gardener, under the above name; and, also, permit me through your columns to thank the lady for furnishing the same. I hav felt, as I hav contemplated these things, "Oh, had I the power to reach the heart of the world!"

That pen-picture of what thousands are suffering in various forms, through that combination known as love and poverty, must reach the hearts of your numerous readers, to say the least, and for that I am glad; and glad to see such questions presented in your columns, for too many Liberals, like too many Spiritualists, are very much afraid of "side issues;" Spiritualists only wanting tests, proof of continued life, evidence of spirit power, and the philosophy of Spiritualism—these, to them, are all-sufficient.

You must not touch the property question—or at least only very gently—must not hit the churches—"They hav their work to do"—must not bring up the practical questions of this life—oh, no! "It will disturb the harmony." Not all Spiritualists do this, but too many—a majority, I very much fear.

Then our Liberals want, too many of them, only the Nine Demands. We must not touch the property question, the questions of creativ life, the abuse of woman under Christian marriage, etc. No, these things produce discord in the ranks, and must not be handled.

Now, all these people are good people, but their hearts need touching aright; they need to hav such light upon these great, practical questions as will sweep the cobwebs of past teachings entirely out of their brains. Love with poverty, and, Industry and economy will bring a competence to all because it has to me, belong in the same category and need masterly pens to show their fallacy.

We want to sweep the church power from the path of the coming millions. It must be done, because her whole spirit is antagonistic to the progress, the welfare, of the race. But the money power is the bulwark of the church power.

Destroy usury-interest on money, and you will sweep away church nurseries all over the land. Our theological institutions are, for the most part, sustained by usury, the interest on endowment funds.

Why is it that our clear-headed thinkers must suppress a portion of the truth, or be driven from the field? Simply because the money power, backed by church power, is against them. Ah, there are plenty of rich men, who, like Mr. Barker, in the story of "The Lady of the Club," are asking: "What will help matters?" "Is there no way to help the living?" No, there is no way, but under an entirely new economic system. O tender souls, who agonize with and for the suffering, I tell you plainly, sadly, but unshrinkingly, there is no help, except in isolated cases, one out of ten thousand, perhaps, no help under our present property system.

"'She is only one of a great many,' I suggested.

"'My God! that is the trouble—so many that the thing seems hopeless. And to think that on every one of these poor souls is laid another burden that that stone spire may go untaxed.'"

It is wrong, this leaving church property untaxed, but, well, I may not be able to make my meaning clear, but I will try. In individual cases a heavier burden may be laid, but not upon all unless the whole amount of tax to be raised is lessened.

Under our present property system, the poor, "every one of those poor souls," are made, as will be found in the final analysis, are made to pay the tax, no matter how distributed. The rich, the employers, all business men, calculate their taxes in their charges, and labor pays all the bills.

An equitable distribution of the taxes shifts burdens, but does not lift them. Taxing church property would take away the undue advantage of churchism over Liberalism, and thus conduce to mental freedom, but Liberalism can no more lift the burden from "every one of those poor souls" than churchism can, or than Spiritualism can, under our present property system.

Both Liberalism and Spiritualism giv advantages over churchism in some directions, but not in property matters.

I can understand "The Lady of the Club," and, also, Mr. Barker's agonizing when he sees the hopelessness, the agony, of love and poverty, for as I look at my children and my grandchildren, and think of what I might hav done for them had I not been poor, when I think of what I hav been deprived of because a descendant of poverty, when I think of all this I feel that all eternity can never make my loss good to me. Oh, it is terrible to see the loved ones suffer, terrible to be forced to deny them what they need and ask for, but there is a deeper, darker sorrow than this—to feel that because of the lack of what you needed your child is born inferior, bodily and mentally—to look upon a blighted being born from your own body, and to know that it is so because of poverty!

"Blessed are the poor in spirit." "The poor of this world, rich in faith and heirs of the kingdom."

How the above has been dwelt upon, amplified, and glorified, and yet deeper, more damnable falsehoods were never uttered. Sentences which could contain more that is detrimental to the welfare of the race could not be framed.

With a clear perception of all this, and with glimpses of an economic system which will change it all, securing a competence, the advantages of wealth and refinement, without the present drawbacks, to every member of society, is it any wonder that men can shout for it upon the scaffold?

It seems to me that Liberals should look deeply into this subject. To-day endowment funds sustain theological schools, the interest of which is paid by labor; and thus are the poor crushed to make ministers. What will Liberals do when they become numerous enough to establish schools and educate teachers? Will they follow the same plan—endowments, funds upon interest? If so, the condition of the poor will be no better than now.

Think of these things, friends.

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

The Canada Secular Congress.

The executiv of the Canadian Secular Union hav fixed Saturday and Sunday, September 14th and 15th, for a convention of Secularists and Freethinkers of Canada. These gatherings the last few years hav increased in importance at each annual meeting, and the results of the work there initiated hav been most satisfactory. Apart from the necessary advantages attending all progress, the Secular advancement recently made in the dominion is significant, as showing what is further required and how such requirements can be realized. The directors of all movements profit by experience, and the executiv of the Canadian Secular Union are no exception to the rule. They hav learned that the Secular element in Canada is an undoubted factor in the mentality of its people, and that both in and out of the church Freethought is a reality. "The one thing needful" at the present time is to direct and consolidate that Freethought upon a Secular basis. The primary object of the coming convention is to do something practical in this direction. Charles Watts, in Secular Thought, suggests to the friends who may then assemble that, among other topics, they should consider the following as worthy of notice: (1) The progress of Secularism in Canada; (2) The desirability of obtaining a hall as the exclusiv property of the Secular party; (3) The establishment of Sunday-schools for the mental training of the young; (4) Provincial Freethought propagandism; (5) The formation of classes for the cultivation of music, singing, debating, and the study of modern science; (6) The appointment of a committee to watch the attitude of the local press upon Secular matters.

The Right to Testify.

CONSTITUTIONAL RULING OF THE NEW JERSEY SUPREME COURT.

Assuming the common law rule to be that no person can be a witness in a judicial proceeding unless he believes that God will punish perjury, it becomes necessary to consider the effect of that clause in the first article of our state constitution which declares that "no person shall be denied the enjoyment of any civil right merely on account of his religious principles." By statute, parties in suits are generally competent witnesses in their own behalf, and when the prosecutor tendered himself as a witness in his own behalf before the common pleas his right to testify would hav been conceded had he believed that God would punish perjury. His right was denied merely because he did not so believe. It was not that he did not think himself bound to tell the truth according to his oath, but only that he had not an affirmativ faith that the divine being would inflict some penalty upon him if he violated his obligation. Two questions, therefore, arise: First, is the right of a party to testify in his own behalf a civil right? secondly, is the belief of a person as to whether God will punish perjury to be ranked among his religious principles?

By civil rights I understood those rights which the municipal law will enforce, at the instance of private individuals, for the purpose of securing to them the enjoyment of their means of happiness. They are distinguishable from natural rights, which would exist if there were no municipal law, some of which are abrogated by municipal law, while others lie outside of its scope, and still others are enforceable under it as civil rights. They are also distinguishable from political rights, which are directly concerned with the institution and administration of government. Among civil rights is the right to prosecute and defend actions in the courts of the commonwealth according to the established rules of practice. This proposition is sufficiently vindicated by a reference to the civil rights cases in the Supreme Court of the United States, where it is assumed as true by all justices of that tribunal. Thus in Strauder vs. West Virginia, 100 U. S. 303, Mr. Justice Strong, expressing the opinions of himself and all his associates, except Justices Clifford and Field, says that the Fourteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution was intended to secure to the colored race all the civil rights which the white race enjoy, and speaks of section 1,977 of the Revised Statutes of Congress (which enacts that all persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall hav the same right to sue, be parties, and giv evidence) as putting in the form of a statute what had been substantially ordained by the Constitutional Amendment. And in ex parte Virginia, 100 U. S., 339, 366, Mr. Justice Field, speaking for himself and Mr. Justice Clifford, says: "The equality of protection secured (by the Fourteenth Amendment) extends only to civil rights as distinguished from those which are political, or arise from the form of the government and its mode of administration; and yet the reach and influence of the amendment are immense. It opens the courts of the country to everyone, on the same terms, for the security of his person and property, the prevention and redress of wrongs, and the enforcement of contracts. It assures to everyone the same rules of evidence and modes of procedure, etc. In the light of these statements, it seems clear that the statutory right of a party to testify in his own behalf is a civil right."

The next question is whether a person's belief as to the punishment of perjury by the deity is to be classed among his religious principles. This is, I think, equally clear. Religious principles are those sentiments concerning the relations between God and man, which may influence human conduct. Of these, perhaps the most influential hitherto has been the view entertained as to the probability that God would punish vice. A person's sentiments on that subject must be deemed part of his religious principles. It is urged that disbelief cannot be called a religious principle. Perhaps, if one denied the existence of a supreme being, it might in a proper sense be said that he had no religious principles, because he could not entertain any opinion touching the relations between God and man, unless a denial of any such relations might be so denominated. But to a person who believes in the existence of a supreme being, there pertain, necessarily, or at least probably, some views with regard to the relations between him and us which modify the life of the individual. The mere fact that in those relations he has discovered no divine purpose of punishment for specific acts, does not militate against his possession of religious principles, and among them are his belief, his disbelief, and his doubt concerning those relations. From these premises it seems to follow that, when a party claims the statutory right to testify in his own behalf, he cannot be denied on the ground that he does not believe God will punish perjury.

God in the Constitution.

From the Fargo, N. D., Argus, Aug. 6, 1889.

To the Argus: Permit me through the medium of your paper to address the following letter to the members of the constitutional convention:

Question. What country is really the most prosperous among the nations of the earth?

Answer. The United States of America.

Q. What is the only country in the world that does not mention or recognize a supreme intelligence in its Constitution?

A. The United States of America.

Q. What may be inferred from this fact?

A. That if there be a supreme intelligence who rules and governs the destinies of nations, he prospers best the nation that does not formally recognize him in its Constitution.

Q. What nation has the best and wisest constitution?

A. The United States of America.

I read that the following preamble to the constitution of North Dakota is proposed and likely to be agreed upon by the constitutional convention: "We, the people of North Dakota, grateful to almighty God for religious and civil liberties, do establish and ordain this constitution."

In this regard I wish to hav a little common-sense talk with those members of the convention who are in favor of this preamble, and shall ask a few questions by way of beginning.

Is it not a fact that you were sent to the convention for the purpose of assisting to frame a constitution; and, in the discharge of your duties, you were not to favor any class or body of men, the constitution that you were expected to assist in framing being solely for the purpose of civil government; and that you were neither instructed nor expected to recognize any religion, creed, or sect, but to leave that entirely to the personal opinion of each individual of our commonwealth?

Is it not a fact that a citizen of any nation in the world, except China, can become a citizen of the United States?

Is it not a fact that within the United States there are naturalized citizens of every, or nearly every, nation on the earth?

Is not every citizen of the United States legally and morally bound to recognize that every other citizen of the United States possesses as much right as he possesses, and in that recognition legally and morally bound to respect his religious convictions?

Is it not a fact that the belief in and conception of the being we call God are obtained from the holy writings of the Jews and the New Testament?

Is it not also a fact that those who believe in the being known as God do not comprise more than about one-fourth of the inhabitants of the world?

If honestly answered, the reply must be in the affirmativ. Now, if by such a formal declaration we recognize alone this being called God, do we not declare the deities of non-Christian countries to be false; and the religions founded upon the belief in such particular deities to be false also; thus giving the lie to any citizen who may believe in other deities or in none at all? Does this respect the opinion of those who do not believe in the deity called God? Surely not. No more than, if the deity called Brahma was substituted for God, would the opinion of those be respected who believe in the being called God.

It is a maxim of our nation that church and state should be kept separate. There are those who are opposed to it, but the conflict between the numerous sects fortunately precludes the realization of their wishes.

I apprehend that there is not a member of the constitutional convention who would consent to hav any state religion; and that at least the large majority of the delegates would repudiate with scorn any insinuation that they had done or would do anything which recognized one religion more than another. Those, I would ask to réad the following: "We, the people of North Dakota, grateful to the almighty Allah for religious and civil liberties," etc. Now, honestly, what inference could alone be drawn from such a preamble? Simply that we, the people of North Dakota, recognized Mohammedanism as the only true religion, and that those who called themselvs Christians were worshiping a false God.

The mention of a deity in the constitution, by whatever name he may be called, officially recognizes that deity as the only and true one, and at once connects state and church. While the state may not support it or assist in maintaining it, except it be by the exemption of church property from taxation, it extends a moral support in its favor, and burdens other religions with the official declaration that they are false.

It is no answer to my argument that we are a

Christian nation. In the first place, that answer is not strictly true. Second, I am not writing from a personal religious belief, but entirely upon the principle that the state in no manner recognizes one deity more than another; thus truly respecting the religion of every citizen within its territory.

We may not hav within North Dakota a single Brahman, Buddhist, or Mohammedan citizen. That fact does not alter the principle. You are legislating for the future more than the present. North Dakota may yet be filled with thousands of Buddhists. Is it right that the laws made for them as well as us should declare their deity false?

Ought not their religious convictions to be respected?

There is another class of citizens I hav thus far omitted—a very respectable minority at least, and including some of the best citizens of North Dakota. I refer to those who believe that the supreme intelligence has made certain fixed laws by which the universe is governed, and that neither prosperity nor adversity is the result of a personal interference of this intelligence; that aside from results arising from elemental conditions, and the natural processes of growth and decay, man makes his own prosperity or adversity. If you officially say to him through the constitution that "almighty God" gave us our "religious and civil liberties," do you not also say as a logical sequence that God personally ordained these things; and if he so personally ordained "religious and civil liberties," did he not also ordain the religious intolerance and persecution of the past, and the present religious intolerance in many other nations of the world? Do you not make him responsible for all disasters and casualties that daily befall the human race; and thus say to the class of citizens last mentioned, "You are fools to believe as you do, for your belief is false?" Are not the convictions of this last class of citizens entitled to respect? Do you respect them by declaring that God especially granted us liberties by special favor, thus setting at naught his convictions to the contrary?

Don't let personal inclinations and predilections make you forget that you are public servants.

Do not delude yourselvs with the belief that one can act and vote contrary to his convictions and past life and utterances, and thus deceive his constituents and thereby gain popularity for future political use among the members of various churches.

Deception in one act begets distrust in the breast of those for whom you acted.

Don't forget that you are building for the future. Make the edifice an honor to yourselvs, and sustain the judgment of those who sent you to aid its construction.

Remember above all things that honesty brings a reward and dishonesty a retribution. And last, but not least, that the Constitution of the United States rules the best and most prosperous nation on earth, and it recognizes no deity; and the constitution of Spain recognizes God and governs a poverty-stricken, bigoted, and intolerant people, and that that fair country of "milk and honey" was never so prosperous as when ruled by the Infidel Moor.

Now be fair. Giv all a chance. Remember we are cosmopolitan.

SAUL.

Reply in a Subsequent Issue.

To the Argus: In a recent issue of your paper I hav read with much surprise a string of blasphemies over the signature "Saul," that would do credit to that rampant wind-bag Bob Ingersoll, and that outdoes that drunken disgrace to his kind, Tom Paine.

A column or so of unsupported assertions are given and, with arrant, blood-curdling blasphemy, the most high God is placed in comparison with mythical heathen deities and with the false gods of ignorant and unchristian people. I sincerely trust that this balderdash will not deter the constitutional convention from doing its duty. That the people of the United States hav become a prosperous nation notwithstanding the fact that God is not mentioned in the national Constitution, is a proof, if it means anything at all, not that a people will prosper because they ignore the supreme cause, but—that God is just and that he does not visit the sins of the constitution-makers upon the people who are not responsible for the reprehensible action. Who is prepared to say, however, that the authors of this constitution were not punished? Can "Saul" assure us that the scoffing Infidel of the last century is not suffering the pangs of the lost in the place of eternal punishment? And who can say but that the terrible war that swept over the country, deluging the land with blood and filling the air with the wail of the widow and the cry of the orphan, was not, in part, a punishment for the sin of our national constitution?

"Saul" is undoubtedly a smart man. In him, genius has its beginning and wisdom its ending; but around him, as around the less talented of God's creatures, there is the perpetual mystery of life and the dark uncertainties of death. To illumin the pathway of the one and to cheer the descent to the other, there is but one light and one comfort. God reigns—and whether worms of the dust recognize him or scoff at him—his eternal justice prevails and governs. This is a Christian country; but whether it is so or not, the truth of Christianity is the mighty rock upon which Infidelity will strike and go down into the boiling sea of God's wrath and vengeance.

From whence is life? From God. He made and owns the universe and the fullness thereof. Without him can no sparrow fall, and safe in the loving arms of his dear son will every faithful one find rest when the tumult of life is over.

"Saul" is a mighty man, but he has gone to sea in a very little boat. The old straw of Infidel authors that he threshes over has been pounded over so long and flailed so unmercifully, that there is no substance in it. It is a waste of time to attempt to controvert his fallacies or to expose his sophistries. Let the constitution-makers, like Job of old, say, "I know that my redeemer liveth," and for the many blessings which we hav received, the blessings of good health and good crops, of unexampled progress and unequaled prosperity, let there be in the state constitution a fitting acknowledgment, to show that we are Christian men and women and that the government is not given over unto the heathen. There need be no conflict between the church and state. So far as the existence and goodness of God is concerned, there is and there can be no argument. All churches will agree in the one fundamental truth that we are indebted to God for our well-being, and if the scoffers and Infidels—whom, God be praised, are few in numbers—do not like to liv in God's country, let them remove themselvs and their odious doctrins to some other country. Not only so, but I hope to see the day when the law will prevent the circulation of the blasphemies of would-be smart men like "Saul."

POLONIUS.

On a Decoration Day Poem.

From Freethought.

I desire to thank "Saladin," editor of the London Agnostic Journal, for his good words in his issue of July 6th; and in order that the reader may see how much reason I hav to be grateful, I will quote what he says:

The Macdonald who was the father of our friend, E. M. Macdonald, of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, and of G. E. Macdonald, of the San Francisco Freethought, was, under the Federal flag, killed in the battle of Bull Run. If, in some other world, his shade takes interest in the affairs of this, he will feel proud of his sons, Eugene and George, who, though in their boyhood they had their father "stretched upon a bloody bier," hav, two orphan boys, lived to attain to position and usefulness, and, in the vanguard of the human race, to carry forward a flag nobler than that under which their father died. I hav long descried through the writings of the two brothers that they hav heart as well as head; and, although the best qualities of both heart and head are necessary in the leaders of the world's forlorn hope, the latter can be dispensed with rather than the former. The last anniversary of the battle of Bull Run came round, and, away amid "California's pathless world of woods," the memory of the younger of the Macdonald brothers reverted to that gory struggle twenty-eight years ago, which, whatever its national significance, threw him upon the world as an orphan boy; and he composed the following elegiac lines [they were reprinted from Freethought in THE TRUTH SEEKER of June 15th], touching in their artless simplicity, and possessed of a literary excellence which makes us regret that the Freethought journalist has duties so exacting that they prevent the lyrical poet's more frequent communings with his lyre.

The lines referred to are those published under the head of "May 30," in Freethought of June 1st. The battle of Bull Run, at which Henry Macdonald lost his life, was fought Aug. 28, 1862, and the recurrence of Decoration Day, May 30th, recalled that event. A monument standing in Sullivan, Cheshire co., N. H., bears this inscription:

HENRY MACDONALD,
of the 6th Regt.
Instantly killed in the Second battle of Bull Run,
August 28, 1862. Aged 35 years.
Buried on the battlefield.

The monument is a humble one, and it stands in an obscure place, but the men whose names and deeds it records bought their little meed of fame at so high a price that they will not be over-rewarded if occasionally we tell the story how they fell.

Though Dead, He Speaketh.

From Lucifer for Aug. 2, 1889.

Hurrah for D. M. Bennett,
Our leader in reform,
Who strikes the stalwart priesthood,
And breasts the coming storm!

A million voices praise him,
A million hearts rejoice,
And millions more are coming
To hear his manly voice.

Though prison bars may hold him,
His spirit rangeth free
To bear the flag triumphant
O'er every land and sea.

Millions will do him homage
When priestcraft is forgot,
Or known alone in history—
A foul and ugly blot.

When Benedict and Comstock
In infamy recline,
The name of D. M. Bennett
Throughout the world will shine.

Then hurrah for our leader!
Down with the rotten church!
Leave not a single fragment
On which the buzzards perch!

They've tortured many millions
With every sort of pain,
And now are crushing Bennett,
Their power to regain.

Rise, O men and women!
Prepare ye for the fight,
And bury bloody priestcraft
In everlasting night.

No Retainer Large Enough for Colonel Ingersoll.

From the New York World.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was sitting in his charming little summer home at Wave Crest, Far Rockaway, the home built by James W. Keene before disaster struck him, when he received a dispatch from the World, announcing that the friends of Judge Terry, in San Joaquin county, wanted him to come out to California to prosecute Judge Field and Deputy Marshal Nagle. It had been sent the night before, but Far Rockaway is out of the telegraphic world after dark, and it did not reach the house until yesterday morning. The genial philosopher said at once:

"I will not go. There is not enough money in California to take me out on such an errand. Why, we might as well banish our courts of law if our judges are to be terrorized and assaulted for rendering honest decisions."

Colonel Ingersoll's loyal family applauded the decision. When a World reporter called in the afternoon he was received with the colonel's never-failing cordiality.

"From all I hav heard and seen," said he, "Justice Field has committed no offense, unless it be one to be insulted. Money could not pay me to prosecute Justice Field in this case. I believe in a perfectly free judiciary. If a judge renders a corrupt decision, the law provides for his impeachment. If suitors who are defeated resort to brute force and the people sustain such a course, then courts should be abolished. The individual must submit to the law as administered and expounded by the courts, and must seek his remedy within the law. That, I think, is all I care to say on this subject."

Colonel Ingersoll is an old-time friend of Judge Field, and holds him in high respect. He knew Sharon many years ago, and has heard from the latter's lips what a desperate and unpleasant woman is Sarah Althea Hill, who exerted such a baleful influence on all who fell under her sway. His knowledge of Terry has come to him through the newspapers. It isn't every lawyer who would refuse a princely fee in such a case, but those who know Robert G. Ingersoll know that money is not the chief aim in life with him.

Painfully True.

From the Pittsburgh Truth.

A correspondent named James W. Fitch complains to THE TRUTH SEEKER, as follows:

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 25th, is an engraving which is called "Sunday as the Sabbatarians Want It." The offices of the physician and surgeon are closed, also the hospital and undertaker's establishment. The sexton is represented as refusing to work, and a policeman forbids the minister's preaching. There is not a Sabbatarian in the world who wants a Sunday like this. It does no good to make such gross misstatements. Out of a dozen Freethinking publications on my desk, there is hardly any that I would show to Christians, unless I wanted to exasperate them.

If Mr. Fitch will come to Pittsburgh he will soon find out that there are thousands and thousands of Sabbatarians who want just such a Sunday. In fact they not only want it, but hav almost secured it. But, of course, they do not want the police to stop ministers from working. That would be fair, you know. It is our opinion that Mr. Fitch has got a very weak backbone. If he has, and wants it stiffened, let him come to Pittsburgh.

Mexico.

From the Argonaut.

The streets of the Mexican capital are no longer paraded by priests bearing the host, at the elevation of which every foreigner and Protestant might be knocked down in adoration of a holy wafer. In the streets of Mexico pontifical millinery is no longer displayed, church bells are silenced of their brassy clamor, churches are secularized, monkeries torn down, and nunneries are no longer convenient to monastic seclusion. Mexico, with its nine millions of people, has only seven millions left in ignorance, poverty, and peonage, resulting from the apostolic tyranny which so long held the world in bondage. In Mexico the schools are at work, and, as the result of education, on the anniversary of the death of Juarez, some thousands of Liberal students in procession cried, "Death to the clergy!" and death to the Conservativ party which would keep the republic of Mexico in longer subservience to the hierarchy of Rome. Galileo was right, the world moves!

What to Do With Decayed Meat.

From the Twentieth Century.

Mr. William Webster believes all the Bible is God's word. This will include Deut. xiv, 21: "Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself; thou shalt giv it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien; for thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God." Mr. Webster would rather "weep and gnash in hell" than hav me punished by law if I sell decayed meat; for God says I may. I admire such devotion, but rather than be placed in Mr. Webster's position I will try and rub along without it.

I am one of the apostates necessary to fulfil Paul's prophecy. If I should write a book full of impossible stories, I would prophesy that large numbers would refuse to believe them. It would make me "solid" with those who did believe.

RINGTUM.

A Bruno Number.

The Freethinkers' Magazine for September will be a Bruno number. It will contain a page illustration of the Bruno monument, George Jacob Holyoake will furnish an original article on "The Murder of a Philosopher," T. B. Wakeman one on "Giordano Bruno in the Past, Present, and Future;" there will be an original poem on Bruno by Lydia R. Chase, a sketch of the life of Bruno by Prof. Thomas Davidson, also an article on Bruno by Karl Blind, from the Nineteenth Century, and much other valuable and interesting matter. The price of the number will be twenty cents, and it will be for sale at this office.

To Enoch.

O Enoch, moving pre-diluvially,
A holy one thou wert as walked the valley—
'Tis thusly in the Holy Queer recorded—
And, being so, wert signally rewarded!
No details of thy doings highly holy
Are given, Enoch, to the meek and lowly;
Bleak statement that, Methuselah begetting,
You "walked with God three hundred years," ne'er fretting,
Tho' walk exceeded far, in time and teasing,
Our "six-day-go's-you-pleases," nothing pleasing.
Great Scott! but what a walk was that—a corker—
Ah, verily, old man, thy name was Walker!
But all at once, the book says, you "were not,"
God scooping you as we a fat jackpot!

SI SLOKUM.

Proceedings of the Washington Constitutional Convention July 28th.

Article 1, the preamble and declaration of rights, was taken up, and the convention went into committee of the whole, with Stiles, of Tacoma, in the chair.

The whole article was read, and then the preamble was taken up, reading thus:

We, the people of the state of Washington, to preserve our rights, do ordain this constitution.

Lindsley moved the following substitute:

We, the people of the state of Washington, grateful to almighty God for our freedom, to secure and transmit the same unimpaired to succeeding generations, do ordain this constitution.

Dyer moved to add after "state of Washington" these words: "Grateful to almighty God for the blessings of liberty and self-government and order."

Turner said he also had a pet preamble which he should like to lay before the committee. It read thus:

We, the people of Washington, in order to form a more independent and perfect government, establish justice, insure tranquillity, provide for common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselvs and to our posterity, profoundly grateful to almighty God for this inestimable right, and invoking his favor and guidance, do ordain and establish the following constitution and form of government for the state of Washington.

Mr. Lindsley withdrew his substitute in favor of Mr. Turner's.

Mr. Dyer's motion was first considered, and that gentleman argued briefly in favor of placing the name of God in the constitution.

Mr. Comegys was entirely opposed to any such action. It is not, he claimed, any question of gratitude or ingratitude, reverence or irreverence, that calls upon this convention to make what he called a second-rate advertisment of itself by putting into its constitution something so entirely out of place there.

Mr. Cosgrove did not think this was uniting church and state, it was simply a recognition of the opinion of men. By leaving out the word "God," the committee indirectly pandered to Infidelity and indirectly attacked Christianity from a merely practical standpoint. He believed such action would discredit the standing of the people and prevent immigration and growth of the state. The man who is not accountable to some deity or other is an unsafe man to hav in the community.

Mr. Buchanan said that apart from any pecuniary consideration, it behoved man to consider that he didn't stand at the head of creation. There is some intelligence far above and beyond the reach of our intellectuality. "I ask to be placed in no better company than him whose name this state bears. I ask to hav read the following as a part of my remarks."

The first inaugural address of Washington was the document sent to the desk, and the clerk read it.

Mr. Turner moved his form of preamble as a substitute for Mr. Dyer's, and expressed briefly his belief in the propriety of thus recognizing the supreme being.

Mr. Warner, chairman of the preamble committee, would yield to no one in reverence for God, but likened the placing of his name in the constitution to the action of the Pharisee in the scripture. He didn't believe it essential there any more than the Lord's Prayer. It was merely a sentiment. If the convention wants to put it there he should not object, but he should vote against putting it there. Mr. Sullivan, of Tacoma, said an able committee had considered this, and he should support its report. There was nothing whatever in the argument that immigration would be affected by. The Constitution of the United States had no God in it, and there was no trouble in this country about getting immigration.

Mr. Griffiths had hoped no such discussion would arise here, and he believed the gentleman offering it would do a great favor if, with the consent of the convention, he would withdraw it.

A voice.—He couldn't get it.

Mr. Griffitts.—From at least one speech I hav heard I should judge he could not, but this action places the opponents of this measure in a peculiar position, from which I shall not shrink. I am not called upon to proclaim my personal religious belief, and shall not do so. The only question here is whether the preamble, as reported by the committee, is a sufficient preface to the constitution which follows. It certainly is sufficient, for what follows is simply political and does not profess to deal with man's religious views. A majority of the state constitutions, as well as that of the United States, commit this sacrilege and irreverence of leaving out God in the preamble. Mr. Turner's substitute is almost an exact copy of the United States Constitution, with the addition of the words "profoundly grateful to almighty God," etc. If seeking immigration involved the necessity of reverence to God in the constitution, then the United States ought to hav covered its constitution all over with references to God, for immigration was the one great thing they wanted. He cited the following states as having no reference to God in the preamble: Arkansas, Delaware, Florida, Georgia (1818), Illinois, Indiana, Kansas (1855), Kentucky (1792), Louisiana, Maryland (but did not put into a later constitution) Michigan (1835), and said he might go further with the Carolinas, Virginia, and others.

Mr. Cosgrove.—Does recognizing God in the constitution recognize religion?

Mr. Griffitts.—It is well known that a great discussion has been going on over this very matter, and I merely wish to avoid provoking any more such discussion. If omitted, nobody's feelings can be hurt or his opinion opposed. I would strike out the slightest reference to anybody's religious belief. We are dealing only with civil and political rights, and should not transcend our province by putting into the constitution these words to which some people object.

Mr. Turner didn't care to follow the last speaker in examination of the constitution, but where he referred to the earlier constitution of the states, it was a fact that later constitutions in the same states did hav reference to God in the preamble. This was a matter of sentiment, he admitted. It also represented his own personal sentiment, and he believed also the sentiments of nine hundred and ninety-nine out of every thousand of adults of the state for whom we are making this constitution, and the convention would simply be recreant to their trust if they did not represent this sentiment in the preamble.

Mr. T. M. Reed cordially coincided with the last speaker, and claimed that no religious question or discussion was here presented, except so far as the gentleman from Spokane (Griffitts) had raised it. The substitute merely proposed to recognize gratitude to almighty God, which he believed was the fact with the people of this state and country.

Mr. Eshelman was indifferent as to the placing of the name of the deity in the constitution, but supported Mr. Turner's substitute as a far better form of words, aside from this question of deity—although he was in favor of the whole substitute.

Mr. Moore regretted the bringing of this question here, but being here, he should discuss it. He had never been a member of any religious body and did not speak from that standpoint, but he supported the substitute as being pleasing to that great body of the people who profoundly and sincerely believe in God. As to those who deny God, they, being simply in a negativ position, need not feel hurt. As to Mr. Griffitts's statement about constitutions, he was wrong if he meant to claim that a majority of the present constitutions had no reference to God. After having this up for discussion, a refusal to put it into the constitution was a bad example to the youth of a growing state.

Mr. Comegys asked if the United States Constitution was a bad example to youth.

Mr. Moore.—According to the tenor of my remarks it would seem so.

Mr. Buchanan.—May I answer the gentleman?

The Chair.—Mr. Moore has the floor.

Mr. Moore.—I yield to the gentleman (Buchanan) for that purpose.

Mr. Buchanan.—I hav always considered that the real preamble to the United States Constitution was the Declaration of Independence, which distinctly and repeatedly acknowledges God.

Mr. Moore.—Three times in the Declaration of Independence do the signers thereof recognize God, and in our annual Thanksgiving day the whole nation recognizes God.

Mr. Tibbetts said he occupied exactly the same position as the last speaker, and should heartily support the substitute.

Mr. Sullivan, of Whitman, said he should hav supported the report of the committee if it had put God in the constitution, and should stand by it now. If there was anything he had contempt for it was doing anything for show and buncombe. To put this in or leave it out means absolutely nothing. It is all stuff and nonsense, and nothing more or less. If this is left out, what detriment will it be to the people of this state or God? The supreme being pays no attention to this convention, or any other political gathering, or to anything else save the motivs of a man. Mr. Chairman, I hope this convention will presently quit this moonshine. The greatest disgrace that has fallen on this convention since it assembled in this city has been the spending of so much time on this stuff and nonsense.

Mr. Power.—I call the gentleman to order for imputing such motivs to delegates.

Mr. Cosgrove.—As he is taking up the greater portion of the time himself, he is simply commenting on his own motion.

Mr. Buchanan.—The gentleman is entirely out of order; he is imputing the basest motivs to gentlemen who hav spoken most reverently on this subject.

The Chair.—The gentleman is in order, but getting very close to the line. [Laughter.]

Mr. Turner desired to speak, but was ruled out, having spoken once, so long as others wished to speak.

Mr. Dyer believed the making of a constitution was one of the most sacred and solemn duties that could be performed. We are not to discuss revealed or natural religion. From the beginning of history, all people hav had a God, and he believed in beginning this great constitution by recognizing the supreme being, whether as God, Allah, or Jehovah, and expressing gratitude to him.

Mr. Godman regretted the turn this debate had taken. He recognized the great value of the teachings of Christ, and reverenced as much as any man the supreme intelligence, but he believed the convention should deal with things seen, things practical, and not with sentiment or mystery, with which this convention had no business to meddle. Principle only and not sentiment was the rule to go by. He should support the report of the committee.

Mr. Sturdevant would not hav voted to let this clause remain, even if the committee had put it in. This is purely a business meeting, to make up a practical, common sense document. If any argument relating to success is to be based on this matter, why has this country had so unbounded a success after it left God out of the Constitution a hundred years ago? As to George Washington, he was a member of the convention which framed the United States Constitution, but did not raise his voice to suggest that God be placed in that constitution; but it was entirely proper for him to ask God's blessing upon himself or on the people when he was beginning his administration. This sentiment had no more place in the constitution than it had in the beginning of a promissory note, or a declaration which commenced an action at law.

Mr. Buchanan did not recollect any debate on this subject in the original constitution, and asked Mr. Sturdevant about that.

Mr. Sturdevant said he had not examined the subject.

Mr. Buchanan.—You made the assertion.

Mr. Sturdevant.—I made no assertion. I simply asked the gentleman to show if Washington said anything on that subject. I am informed by a friend (Mr. Comegys) that he believes the subject was fully debated there.

Mr. Cosgrove said such method of argument was essentially unfair, and he was glad it was made so apparent to the convention. He commented on the sermon on the Christian religion which one gentleman (Sullivan, of Whitman), had delivered, when the Christian religion had not been brought up at all, and if, as the gentleman has said, this convention is the laughing-stock of the press for its actions, it is for just such debates as this and for just such remarks as hav been made here this morning. The party which organized this convention, from president to page, would be held responsible for all that was left out as well as for all that was put into this constitution, and might find itself needing votes for this document from the very people who would withhold them from it, unless a simple recognition of the supreme being was in.

Mr. Warner was a member of a church which had the most reverent devotion to God, but did not believe it necessary to advertise that fact in their business transactions. The committee had discussed the matter very briefly, and simply recognized the constitution as a business document, and decided to leave out any mere matter of sentiment.

Mr. Turner said Mr. Sullivan, of Whitman, had been in the habit, from the very commencement, of lecturing and hectoring this convention, in season and out of season, and in common with others he had borne it with what equanimity he might, but when he commented with the coarsest buffoonery on the motivs of gentlemen on this floor, and upon his own (Turner's) motivs in offering this substitute, he had gone too far. It was from the highest motivs of duty that he had offered this substitute. He felt profoundly reverent, personally, for the happy circumstances under which the convention and the people of the state are living, and prefaced his substitute under that motiv alone. He repeated that he considered it in bad taste, as well as in contradiction of the rules of this body, to impute such motivs to any member who exercised the merest privilege of duty in offering such substitutes and amendments as he thought right.

Mr. Sullivan wanted to say, for the benefit of Judge Turner, and any other man, that he should hav better judgment than to impute motivs to a gentleman who was declared to be in order by the chair. "I imputed no motivs. The gentleman can keep his insults to himself. I can take care of myself both in and out of this convention."

Mr. Cosgrove called the gentleman to order.

Mr. Turner hoped the gentleman would be allowed to proceed, and the chair allowed him to proceed.

Mr. Sullivan hoped there would be no more imputing of motivs to him, for he only intended to make an argument, and not impute motivs, but he didn't like to hav any gentleman abuse him. He had never allowed that since he was five years old, and he didn't propose to now—Judge Turner, or anybody else.

Mr. Dunbar attempted to pour oil on the troubled waters, but Mr. Griffitts thought they were in the second round, and he ought to hav another chance.

The chair recognized Mr. Dunbar, on the ground that even if they were in the second round, any delegate who had not spoken at all was entitled to the preference.

Mr. Dunbar moved that the committee rise and report progress. Carried; yeas 36, nays 24.

The president resumed the chair, and Mr. Stiles reported progress on behalf of the committee, and leave to sit again was granted.

Mr. Dunbar moved to adjourn; lost.

Mr. Griffitts moved to take a recess at 2 o'clock; carried.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

On a motion of Warner, the convention resolved itself into a committee of the whole on the preamble and bill of rights; Stiles, of Tacoma, in the chair.

The question was stated by the chair to be on Mr. Dyer's motion.

Moore said it was generally understood that they were speaking to the amendment offered by Turner.

The chair stated that Dyer's was merely an amendment to the preamble, whereas Moore's was a substitute for the whole preamble.

On Dyer's amendment the question was put, and it failed.

Turner's substitute was taken up, read, and failed; ayes, 32; nays, 34.

Minor offered the following substitute:

We, the people of Washington, with profound reverence for the supreme ruler of the universe, in order to secure and perpetuate the blessings of self-government, do ordain and establish this constitution for the state of Washington.

Adopted; ayes, 33; nays, 32.

The question was then put on the adoption of the preamble as thus amended.

T. M. Reed raised a point of order that the adoption of the substitute adopted the preamble.

The chair stated that the point was not well taken.

The motion to adopt the preamble was voted on, and the vote was a tie, 33 to 33, so the motion falls.

Sullivan, of Tacoma, moved to refer back the preamble to the committee on preamble.

Griffitts moved to adopt the preamble as reported originally by the committee.

T. M Reed moved to lay on the table.

Cosgrove raised a point of order that Griffitts's motion was out of order. The chair ruled the point well taken.

Mr. Griffitts asked what was the status of the question now.

The chair.—The preamble as amended is now before the committee for amendment, or anything else.

Griffitts said that when a thing had failed it was dead, as he understood it, and so there was no preamble, and he ought to be allowed to move anything he asked for a preamble.

Moore.—The chair should giv the deciding vote.

Chair.—I voted on the point, and there made a mistake.

Cosgrove.—It was no mistake. The chair has a right to vote in committee of the whole.

Griffitts.—I now move that we adopt the following preamble: "We, the people of the state of Washington, do ordain this constitution."

Mr. Hoyt stated that the chair should not vote, except on roll call or a rising vote.

The chair.—I suggest that the question be put again as the best solution.

Mr. Turner.—I move that the committee report the preamble back to the convention, with the recommendation that it be recommitted to the committee on preamble, so ordered.

The president resumed the chair.

Stiles reported progress, and recommended that the preamble be recommitted to the committee on preamble.

Warner hoped not, but the convention preferred to hav this committee wrestle with it again, and so voted.

TWO DAYS LATER—FINAL ACTION.

Warner submitted a communication from the National Reform Association, asking that God be recognized in the constitution; referred to the preamble committee.

Gowey presented a petition from the Washington Sabbath Association, relativ to legislation to secure Sunday rest; referred to the committee on preamble.

Warner made a report from the preamble committee on the subject of placing the name of the deity in the constitution. The majority report leaves it out, and is signed by Warner, Hicks, Comegys, Dallam, and Henry. The minority report puts it in, and is signed by Sohns and Kellogg. Both reports were referred to the committee of the whole.

Durie moved going into committee of the whole on the report of the committee on preamble.

Durie's motion prevailed, and Stiles, of Tacoma, resumed the chair as chairman of the committee on the whole. The majority and minority reports of the committee on preamble were read, as follows:

Majority Report.

We, the people of the state of Washington, to secure the blessings of liberty, insure domestic tranquillity, and preserve our rights, do ordain this constitution.

Minority Report.

We, the people of Washington, grateful to the supreme ruler of the universe for our liberty, do ordain this constitution.

Lindsley moved that the minority report be adopted.

Sullivan (Tacoma) moved that the committee rise and recommend that the convention settle the whole matter. Lost.

Warner did not rise to discuss the matter, but simply stated the position of the committee. "We hav considered it a mere sentiment and of little consequence either way, and shall be satisfied whichever way the committee decide, but trust the subject will not be debated."

Comegys moved to amend by substituting "majority" for "minority."

Cosgrove called attention to the real point at issue, so that the gentlemen who hav said they had no real objections to the name of the deity in the constitution need make no mistake.

Willison asked the effect of voting aye, as he was absent from the debate yesterday.

The chair stated that voting "aye" on this motion was equivalent to leaving out the name of God from the preamble.

The motion of Comegys was lost, and Lindsley's motion prevailed—yeas, 45; nays, 22. So that the phrase, "Grateful to the supreme ruler of the universe for our liberties," is the way it will stand in the constitution.

T. M. Reed moved that the committee rise and report back the article and recommend its adoption. So voted.

The president resumed the chair.

Stiles reported the article and recommendation of the committee of the whole.

The question was then upon concurrence in the amendments made by the committee of the whole, and they were all considered together, and the yeas and nays ordered. All the amendments were concurred in by a vote of 53 to 19.

More Free Speech in Monte Vista.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Monte Vista, Spanish or Mexican for "mountain view," is a phenomenon in several respects. Beautifully situated, with a full view of the Rocky mountains, the towering Sierra Blanca a score or more miles to the northeast, it is highly favored by as lovely scenery as even Switzerland can boast. Planted, as may be said, in the very heart of the wonderland known as San Luis valley, or park, but larger than the states of Connecticut and New Jersey thrown into one, and lifted skyward seventy-five hundred feet above sea level. It is now more than two years that I hav resided near here, fifteen miles northeast toward the Sangre de Christo range, and needless to add that, with my love of glorious scenery, I hav had a biennial feast, plenty of sunshine, pure air, physical exercise, and splendid health. Permit me to say I can answer no more inquiries about this country. I had a deluge solely from a few inoffensiv articles I wrote for THE TRUTH SEEKER when I first came here. Now nearly the whole country is taken, and mine is the satisfaction of knowing that I induced a number of Liberals to come here who are now in possession of some of this rich land, and nearly all are contented and happy. I am willing to oblige my friends, but as I am now on the eve of giving my undivided attention to the lecture field, I again say my time will not permit of any more correspondence concerning Colorado.

My campaign opened in Armory Hall, Monte Vista, under the management of that prince of Liberals, John Trueblood, three lectures, "How was the Bible Made, or Did God ever Write a Book?" "The Clergy a Source of Danger to the American Republic" (looks so now more than it did twenty years ago, nearly, when I first published my book with that title, and put into it the last dollar I had, while Liberals then "poohed," said, "There is no danger"—the bulk of them did that then), "Thomas Paine, the Misrepresented." The attendance and respectful attention I received at this course was a great improvement upon my treatment a year and a half ago, when I gave the first course of "Infidel" (begging Brother Westbrook's pardon) addresses ever given there. The little, young town was in a fever over the sacrilege, for be it known that it was started on the close corporation plan. The religious editor, who claims to hav nursed the town upon his own warm, palpitating bosom, was shocked, horrified, and flew to his pen to portray the pent-up agony that rent his pious heart. Said he:

The Graphic greatly regrets that anybody should hav found it either desirable, pleasurable, or profitable to inflict upon our young community a series of Infidel lectures.

And all the little preachers and saintly sycophants yelped a response, even some who told me privately that they, too, are Liberals, I not even asking them to avow their convictions at the time. There are so many people whose highest felicity appears to be to drift with the tide. When Freethought becomes ascendant this class will claim the honor of having been the first to bare their manly (sic) "buzzums" to the shafts of orthodox malice.

Well, "Old Powell," as he insists upon his friends calling him, was the first to "inflict." Trueblood, whom Ingersoll calls a true man, and Christians call a fanatic—for is it not noticeable that if a Freethinker has the zeal and courage of his convictions he is denounced, while if he has zeal, earnestness, courage, stands up for Jesus, in season and out, he is such a good man?—well, John Trueblood has taught the Monte Vistans, even Christians, by his every-day life that Ingersoll was right. Is anybody in distress? John Trueblood, overflowing with humanity, braves obloquy, and lifts up his brother in trouble while the big tears stand in his eyes. He does what the Christians' Jesus advised; but John preaches Infidelity, circulates Freethought books, pamphlets, tracts, while binding up the broken hearted. This is what no Christian can understand—why an Infidel should be a good man. Hav not the preachers told them it is impossible? Yet there stands John Trueblood, the honest blacksmith, hammering away with arm and tongue that it is false as hell—their hell. That is the kind of living sermon John preaches every day in the week—the earned blacksmith, more than a match for all the preachers of Monte Vista in history, science, and theology, the latter their "own and only." They appear to be conscious of it, for they shun John, the Infidel evangelist.

Monte Vista is not yet seven years old, yet the pretty little city has a palatial hotel, Blanca House, or simply, the Blanca, built of pink-colored rock obtained near the town, several elegant business blocks constructed of white rock, some of grayish, in the highest style of modern architecture, a fine school building, exceedingly tasteful churches, and is now putting in an electric light plant. Over all and crowning its prosperity the Soldiers' and Sailors' Home is to be located at Monte Vista, just telegraphed by Associated Press dispatch all over America. Orlando Bonner, with subscription paper in hand, obtained $24,500 for the home. Orlando is pious, theoretically, but an energetic, number one business man. He would make a good Liberal if he had time to take lessons of John Trueblood.

Joy over the conversion of a sin—I mean the editor of the Graphic. Eighteen months ago he was greatly regretting that Satan, or "Old Powell," should inflict Infidel lectures. Now hear him after my second infliction:

Infidel arguments and the claptrap of those who would undermine the foundation of the Christian faith are best answered by the consistent living and the triumphant dying of the true followers of the prince of peace. That base counterfeit Christians are in circulation only proves that there is genuin coin. That Infidelity sticks to the counterfeit and holds it up to ridicule, is probably a real help to the cause of Christianity by aiding to winnow the chaff from the wheat.

In less than two years! What a "defender of the faith" he is! Formerly it was not "desirable, pleasurable, or profitable." Now, "probably a real help to the cause of Christianity."

But what constitutes "consistent living" by a Christian? Does any Christian consistently liv the teachings of the Bible? Does he industriously practice poverty which his Jesus enjoined on him? Does he practice anything his master enjoined? Hav not millions of Catholics given proof of "triumphant dying?" Is this not indeed their boast? Does it prove their religion true? What a logician! Who are the true followers of the prince of peace? Were any of those millions who bathed their hands in the blood of their victims "followers of the prince of peace?" Or were they "base counterfeit Christians?" If Christians profess but do not, or, as they say, cannot, practice, are they "true followers?" Of the twelve hundred inhabitants, are not the majority, if Christians, "base counterfeit," the captain being judge? Surely the editor is not helping his Christian cause by such damaging admissions. Is this why he did not "deign" to notice my present course of lectures? as one of my neighbors remarks, who says to me in private, "I am pretty much of a Liberal myself," and when in the society of Christians sympathizes with them—"all things to all men," a two-faced "cheek-by-jowl." But this is laughable: Editor of a country paper refusing to notice my addresses. Careless reader. He did notice them, but not elaborately as a year ago or more, and name omitted. He has grown discreet.

Nicholas and Millard Powell hav always walked up promptly and deposited $5 each, doubling when necessary to enable people to hear Freethought advocacy. My first course of lectures roused the wrath of the religious. It was supposed, doubtless, that a new man to expound our principles might win, so my able brother, Watts, was sent for, who had no such audience as his fame and ability as a lecturer entitled him to; but it was seen that the "unco guid" would not "deign" to listen to the angel Gabriel.

The Right to Testify.

Judge Dixon, of the supreme court of New Jersey, recently delivered an opinion that is decidedly of national interest. It affords the exceptional instance of a supreme court, or any high court, in this country deciding that a man's civil rights, as set forth in the Constitution, are more important than the common law rule that no person who denies that God will punish perjury can be a witness in a judicial proceeding. Although Judge Dixon delivered the opinion, it must be remembered that it was the opinion of the entire supreme court of New Jersey, with the exception of Judge Depue, of Newark, who dissented. The case came before the court in the shape of an appeal from the Essex county court of common pleas. That tribunal, through Judge Kirkpatrick, refused to allow a man to testify on his behalf in an action for debt because of his denial of punishment for perjury by the almighty. He stated that he believed in the existence of a supreme being and did not deny a future state, but he believed the penalty prescribed by the state would be the only punishment he would receive in case he gave false testimony while under oath. The witness was deemed incompetent, and because he could not giv his evidence he lost his suit. It was on the appeal from the decision of the lower court that the supreme court rendered the opinion in question and overruled the original decision. At the time the supreme court rendered its decision, the full text could not be obtained, but we hav now procured it, and readers will find it on another page of this paper. It is said the case will be appealed from the supreme court of New Jersey to the United States Supreme Court, on the ground that an underlying constitutional question is involved, which the highest tribunal of the nation should determin once and for all. Freethinkers will reflect that the decision of this court is, like the decision of any court in any age, merely the visible manifestation and expression of the sentiment in the minds of the people. This sentiment in the minds of the people takes its rise from the reading of Freethought literature and the hearing of Freethought speech. So the way to continue getting more such decisions, in spite of Christian efforts to prevent and suppress them altogether, is to forward the reading of more Freethought literature and the hearing of more Freethought speech.

Christianity and Art.

An artist reports that while recently traveling through western Pennsylvania he saw in a village a company of persons having a dress and general appearance of that degree of picturesqueness that always inspires in artists an irresistible desire to transfer the effect to canvas. Presently learning that these persons belonged to a small religious sect of peculiar tenets, one of which tenets was the occasion of their wearing that peculiar attire, he took a journey to their settlement, and solicited the privilege of making their portraits. He says:

"I asked the man of the house if I might make a sketch of the interior of the room we looked into, and if I might be able to hav some of his women pose for me.

"He seemed horrified at the proposition. 'What, make pictures?'

"'Why, yes. Everything here is so very picturesque; I am charmed with it all.'

"He looked at me sadly, and answered: 'No, we don't want any pictures made here; we consider pictures sinful—works of the devil. In the Bible God expressly forbids his people to make any graven image or likeness of anything in the heaven above, in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth; and we govern our lives by what we find in the Bible, and treat God's commands to us as having been made seriously.'

"The man was so devoutly in earnest in what he said that I declare I couldn't argue the question with him. After we left him, however, my friend insisted that we visit the temporary preacher, who was the head of the community, to see if we couldn't secure some sort of 'dispensation' from him; but it was no use, and we had our thirty-six-mile drive for nothing."

In itself this incident is a small affair, but it deserves some attention as representing the lingering remains among us of a feature of Christianity that was once of great proportions and formed one of the substantial parts of that faith. That feature is, antagonism to art. Christians now hav become in part Rationalized, and patronize art almost like sane people; but we want it understood that it was not always so. We want it understood that they were for many centuries the deadly enemies of art. And such they were necessarily, as the very essence of their belief is abhorrence of the physical world as drawing devotion away from its true object, the spiritual world above. People must not be misled by the changed course of Christians of to-day; to-day those calling themselvs Christians are very different from those of the times of strong belief. Let Christianity be again believed as strongly as it was then, and art, with science and every other agency aimed at making agreeable man's lot in this world, will perish as before.

It is the pagan Greeks and Romans, especially the former, that gave art its development and perfection. All that has been done since their day is, as the night of Christianity slowly passes away, to resurrect the few fragments of glorious achievement Christian zeal has not been able to find and destroy, and attempt their imitation. And in this imitation we find ourselvs far and feebly below the ancient ideal.

At the spread of Christianity, the priests, and especially the monks, getting into their crazed pates, among their other insane fancies, the notion that the pagan statues were tenanted by "demons"—whatever they may be—made it one of their principal objects to break these statues in pieces. They found awaiting their clubs and hammers the most vast and glorious collection of statuary and sculpture the world has ever seen. Some works were of marble, while most were of ivory and gold; and these latter appealed to the cupidity of the church leaders, while the fanaticism they had instilled in the rabble provided a means of obtaining its gratification. No features are more wonderful in the history of the Greek states than the immense sums they consented to withdraw from all other objects to expend on the cultivation of beauty, and the religious care with which their precious works of art were preserved unharmed amid all the vicissitudes of national fortune, amid war, rebellion, and conquest. Their preservation was in part due to the intense esthetic feeling that was general in antiquity, but in part also to the Liberal and tolerant spirit of their religions, which made men regard with reverence the objects and ceremonies of worships other than their own, and which was especially manifested by the Romans, who in all their conquests respected the temples of the vanquished as representing under many forms the aspiration of man to his creator. Both of these sentiments were blotted out by Christianity. For about fifteen hundred years the conception that there could be anything deserving of reverence or respect, or even of tolerance, in the religions that were external to the Christian church, was absolutely unknown; and at the same time the antiphysical ascetic theories destroyed all reverence for beauty. The marble was mutilated and overthrown; the metals were plundered. Those statues that survived the fury of the early monks were destroyed by the Iconoclastic sect later, or, in the case of those carried to Constantinople, by the Crusaders. Art had perished from the earth; and when toward the close of the twelfth century a revival took rise from the study by Nicolas of Pisa of a few remains, and from discoveries at Rome, such of the popes as had not a personal leaning to art instituted general persecutions of artists that long harassed its regrowth.

We repeat, that study of the fundamental principles of Christianity will make it clear to anyone that such courses must invariably accompany a state of society in which that religion is held with undiluted faith. Early Christianity made the suppression of all bodily passions the central notion of sanctity. In this respect philosophers and saints were unanimous. Plotinus was so ashamed of the possession of a body, that he refused to hav his portrait taken on the ground that it would be to perpetuate his degradation. Gnosticism and Manicheism maintained as their cardinal tenet the essential evil of matter; and some of the Cathari are said to hav even starved themselvs to death in their efforts to subdue the propensities of the body. Of the orthodox saints, some made it their especial boast that for many years they had never seen their own bodies; others mutilated themselvs in order to more completely restrain their passions; others labored with the same object by scourgings and fastings and horrible penances. All regarded the body as an unmingled evil, its passion and its beauty as the most deadly of temptations. Art, while governed by such sentiments, could not possibly arrive at perfection. On the other hand, among the Greeks beauty of every order was the highest object of worship. In art no subject was tolerated in which deformity of any kind was manifested. Even suffering was habitually idealized.

And we wish to say that in the destruction of art there is the destruction of one of the greatest helps to morals, and of one of the greatest helps to intellectual development.

Art is promotiv of morality in many ways. One way is in providing a form of pleasure in which all can share without conflicting, different from the ordinary pursuits of jealous gain, in which enjoyment is exclusiv, one's success being others' loss and pain. Thousands go to see a work of art and they all enjoy the same thing, get the same idea in their minds, and are to that extent made one; they feel together, the enjoyment is for each hightened and not lessened by being shared with others, the sympathies are unconsciously extended, and in the end the art-object is left unconsumed and the same. Another way in which art is subservient to moral growth will appear upon a consideration of the community of nature subsisting between the moral feelings and the feelings excited by art. Those excited by art are in great part the feelings of harmony, proportion, fitness. So the moral feelings in great part consist of a sensibility to harmony in human affairs, proportion in acts and relations, fitness in everything. Faculties attuned to an exquisit perception of physical beauty are in a stage where a slight impulse carries them into the region of exquisit perception of moral beauty.

We said that in the destruction of art there is the destruction not only of one of the greatest helps to morals, but of one of the greatest helps to intellectual development. This is true. The development of the imagination always prepares the way for the development of reason. Men were entranced with the chaste beauty of Greek literature before they were imbued with the spirit of abstraction, of free criticism, and of elevated philosophy that it breathes. They learned to admire a pure style or a graceful picture before they learned to appreciate a refined creed or an untrammeled philosophy. That stage of intellectual progress in which the mind exercises itself in tracing the relations of proportion, symmetry, fitness, in concrete objects, ushers in that stage in which the mind has become enabled to trace the relations of proportion, symmetry, fitness, in abstract objects. Equally in chiseling a piece of architecture and in elaborating a theory, the qualities aimed at are order, just correspondence, truth.

Such is a short account of the pagan relations to art, the Christian relations to art, art's moral effects, and its intellectual effects.

Religious Despotism.

No mail matter was taken to any of the post-offices of the Jersey seashore last Sunday. This cessation of the Sunday service is by order of Postmaster-general John Wanamaker, and it came without warning, the first intimation of it being a telephone message from the New York office, at about the time when the Sunday morning mail-bags were accustomed to arrive, saying that the Sunday service was discontinued. The feeling in the great hotels, where Sunday is the chosen day of the week for reading and writing letters, amounted to indignation. The anger of the thousands who get their daily newspapers by mail was especially outspoken. Sabbatarianism has all along prevailed at Ocean Grove and Asbury Park, but the people at Long Branch hav enjoyed their Sunday mail, and those at West End and Hollywood are indignant at the deprivation of the service. "What do you think of Mr. Wanamaker's withdrawal of our Sunday mail?" was asked of Mr. George W. Childs, who is a summer resident at Elberon. "Well, John shouldn't hav done it," was the reply.

Our subscribers know perfectly well that we never giv a thought to whether Wanamaker is Republican or Democrat. We hav said often enough that we hav no predilections for either party. Our business is to try to keep a sleepy people awake to the constant tendency of the government under Christian influence to encroach upon their rights, and we intend to hold up to execration every official who takes part in that encroachment perfectly regardless of his party. It is not long since we had a page of ridicule of a governor for issuing canting thanksgiving proclamations, and the governor was a Democrat, and the one who may be our next candidate for president. And the very first Democratic official that we hear of in any part of the country using his office to narrow religious liberty, we shall censure in precisely the same language as that which we are now using. What we are going to say about Wanamaker is this: We are willing to giv him the benefit of the doubt, and hope that some explanation of his action may be forthcoming that will show it to spring from other than motivs of religious zeal; but taking it in connection with previous matters, we are only too afraid that he is actuated by desire to promote his religion by force, and if it finally so appears we shall use in regard to him some expressions that will not be moderate.

We will append a telegram from Pennsylvania to the New York World:

"Postmaster-general Wanamaker recently appointed Thomas N. Fretz, son of Dr. A. N. Fretz, a former Democratic candidate for Congress, postmaster at Fleetwood, this county. The Republicans were incensed. Explanation was given that Wanamaker appointed Fretz, who is a Presbyterian theological student, because he needed the salary—$700 a year—to help him into the ministry. The Republicans of Fleetwood hav placed a complete boycott on the office. They are having all mail sent to Blandon, three miles away, which has a Republican postmaster, who delivers it by special carrier. The receipts of the Fleetwood office hav fallen off, and it is not believed that hereafter they will amount to $250 a year."

Christian Spirituality.

A common charge made by the orthodox against Freethinkers is that the latter are lacking in spirituality; that they are of gross and earthy cast, given to coarse material pleasures, and antagonizing the exaltation of mind over matter. Now, here are two totally distinct affirmations mixed so as to hav the appearance of one. We are affirmed to oppose the exaltation of spirit over matter, and we are affirmed to oppose the exaltation of mind over matter. Spirit and mind—here are two totally distinct things. Let the Freethinker note that they are distinct, and keep that distinction in mind to disentangle the willfully confused accusation wherewith the orthodox seeks to abash him.

The Freethinker recognizes mind as one of the many forms of force, and to ascertain just how high he will place its value relativ to matter, we hav simply to resort to the standard by which he measures all things—In what degree does it conduce to happiness? The answer is, that mind conduces to happiness in a greater degree than matter—that is, that mental pleasures conduce to happiness in a greater degree than material pleasures. So he givs the preference to mind, and endeavors by scientific and intellectual culture generally to giv it a greater proportionate development than the material capacities of our constitution. But at the same time he recognizes the due value of matter—of the physical side of our nature. He sees that the two are intimately connected, and that the development of the mental is unavoidably dependent on the good condition of the physical. So he discourages the neglect of either, but awards each its just place and consideration. In short, he acts like any man of sense—sees things in their just proportions, values them as they should be valued, and orders them as they should be ordered.

Then we come to spirit. And here obscurity ensues and all clear perception of anything is extinguished. Here we enter the land of confusion and bewilderment. Here mind and matter and this something else called spirit mingle inextricably. What is spirit? The only thing that we can make out about spirit in the muddled conceptions and language of Christians is that it is neither matter nor mind, but a third thing which we do not know anything about and of which we hav no proof, but which nevertheless we must believe exists. Who believes that the thing is anything more than the invention of priests that they may get money out of us by pretending authority over the domain of this spirit, and pretending to influence with an imaginary fountain-head of it called God?

Then let us make clear our position on these two things. Mind we exalt; spirit we repudiate and despise.

The truth is, these Christians that are ever protesting that they are devoted to higher aims and pleasures, and adverse to the low ones of matter, are the very men that are most addicted to those low ones. Their "spiritual" pleasures are not higher ones; are not high at all; are not intellectual pleasures at all. Of all mental manifestations they are the ones lowest in the scale and nearest to sensual pleasures. Their spiritual pleasures consist, we say, simply of the loosing of that turbulent and greedy longing for gratification—gratification of every desire—common to every creature, man or beast. They consist simply of the loosing of that desire from the restraints of reason. And they are invariably fatal to the development of the true high activities that hav the capability of bringing us real and permanent happiness. They are directly opposed to the exercise of the true high faculties, the mental ones. The spiritual pleasures are associated with the sensual ones, and hav always been found with them. For centuries the priests of Europe repressed the development of the intellectual faculties to the end that they might sell to the people their spiritual pleasures. Then, retiring inside their monastic and conventual walls, they indulged their sensual ones. A pope rolling in debauchery or a preacher bathing his desire for gratification in ecstacies of imagined future happiness, and combating the extension of science with its development of the intellectual activities and pleasures—such a one is the devotee of the gross and the low and the enemy of the high. To find in its most luxuriant growth greedy desire and sensual propensity we are not to look among naturalists and philosophers, whose highest happiness is the intellectual enjoyment of nature, and whose highest aim is the knowledge of her laws. We find it in the palaces of the ecclesiastical princes—of those hypocrits who, under the outward mask of a pious worship of God, solely aim at hierarchical tyranny over, and material spoliation of, their fellow-men. Blind to the infinit grandeur of the so-called "raw material," and the glorious world of phenomena arising from it—insensible to the inexhaustible charms of nature, and without a knowledge of her laws—they stigmatize all natural science, and the culture arising from it, as sinful "Materialism," while really it is this which they themselvs exhibit in a most shocking form. Satisfactory proofs of this are furnished, not only by the whole history of the Catholic popes, with their long series of crimes, but also by the history of the morals of orthodoxy in every form of religion.

Editorial Notes.

A GOOD way to ascertain what effect religion has on morals is to look over the names in the criminal items in the dailies, and see what nationality they belong to—our most religious nationality or our least religious one.

ADA SMYTH, at Barnstable, England, reports the Freethinker, drowned her little boy in the bathroom, and said she had "sent him to heaven." The doctors certified her as suffering from religious mania. For years she had thought herself to be under God's curse and in the power of the devil. The poor woman is now in a lunatic asylum along with her many fellow-victims of religion.

AT Plymouth, Mass., a national monument in honor of the Pilgrim fathers was dedicated on the 1st. The corner-stone of the monument was laid Aug. 1, 1859. Completed, it has cost over $200,000, collected from all parts of the country. A monument to Paine where he landed would hav been of some propriety. As to that of the Pilgrim fathers, it is worse than rubbish. The most distinct among the belongings landed by the Puritans was a fierce and intolerant Christianity, and that is enough to ruin any country. The reason it has not, so far, ruined this, is that it has been met and mitigated by those of sense and sanity among the people, of whom Paine stands at the head.

THE First Presbyterian church, of Erie, has run afoul of the law preventing the importation of labor. After looking around for some time for a pastor, it agreed to call Rev. H. C. Ross, of Ingersoll, Ont. It has been informed that, Mr. Ross being a Canadian, the law will work in his case and prevent him from accepting the call. What we wish noticed is that when the case of the European professors imported for the Catholic University was considered, the decision was otherwise. This registers the difference in degree of political influence between the First Presbyterian church of Erie and the Romish machine.

THE negroes around Walker's Chapel, in Baldwin county, Ga., hav closed a religious discussion with a tragedy which threatens to lead to lynching. For several weeks the members hav been wrought up over the question of regeneration. On the night of the 9th inst. the discussion grew more pronounced, Henry Sample and Sim Reeves being the leaders of the opposing schools of thought. The brethren soon passed from words to blows, when Sample threw Reeves down and rolled him on the floor. As soon as Reeves escaped from Sample's vengeance he went home, got his shotgun, and hurriedly returned to the church. Reeves waited until Sample turned full breast toward him, when he discharged the full load of shot at him, Sample soon dying. As ever.

IN Alabama a duel was fought on the 10th inst. It was not fought in one of those states in which Freethought is widespread, though if what Christians say were true we should expect those states to be the ones that would hav such practices, and be falling back into barbarous ways generally. No, it was fought in just that state from which we hear of the latest religious persecution. Thus it is ever, barbarous practices and Christian belief going together. It is so in time and so in place. In time, as history shows us that those times in which one was most prevalent were the times in which the other was most prevalent also. In place, as we now see around us that those places in which one is most prevalent are the places in which the other is most prevalent also.

IN news from South Carolina we find in every line this sort of language: "Shooting and cutting;" "a vendetta;" "family feuds;" "caning and shooting scrape;" "shotgun, pistol, and razor;" "shot and killed." Longer stretches of language read like this: "The nimble pistol is again at work in the Palmetto state" (Sun). "There hav been no less than five or six shooting and cutting scrapes within the last three days" (Ibid.). "The state is smeared with blood from the seaboard to the mountains" (Charleston News and Courier). "Justice has fallen into a state of innocuous desuetude" (Ibid.). Now, is South Carolina known as a strongly Christian state or as one in which Rationalism has made progress? If as the former, what are we to think of preachers' assertions about Christianity producing morality and public order?

EVERYWHERE the effects of religion obtrude themselvs on us. We cannot cast a glance about without its falling upon them and their unfortunate character. The island of Crete, in the Mediterranean, is convulsed with conflicts between the Christians and Moslems. Anarchy prevails there. It has always been the tendency of religious differences to subvert public order whenever they hav not been sternly held under by civil government. Another case in another part of the world is this: In Kingston, Ontario, Canada, on the 12th Catholics and Protestants managed to get together and fight like angry cats when the law officials were out of the way. They threw vitriol on one another and in divers such ways evinced their fulness of divine love. By these sectarian animosities the whole of Canada is held checked in development and civilization.

"ARRANGEMENTS hav been completed for lighting the Metropolitan Museum of Art so that it may be open evenings during the coming winter. There is always a free supply of daylight on Sunday, which would enable thousands of people to see the art treasures who cannot well go at any other time. Is the Sunday sunlight wicked?"

To the question with which the World concludes the above, we would humbly reply, Yes. The Sunday daylight is very, very wicked. In fact, on Sunday all nature is wicked. On that dav, all of nature regularly evinces a degree of depravity the most hardened and goes right on working just the same as though Presbyterians had not made all that sort of thing desperately criminal by statute. To tell the truth, it has always been perceived that the Lord is himself inclined to laxness in letting these matters go on as they do; hence these ascetic enactments, which are to be regarded as remedying the too lavish goodness of the Lord.

THE villagers of Freeport, N. Y., hav had two brothers committed for examination as to sanity on account of what they call the men's "strange doings." Once the brothers borrowed an oil stove from a neighbor, carried it to the beach, and roasted a turkey alive. This they said was the offering up of a live sacrifice for the sins of Freeport. The villagers call this "strange doings" now, yet believe like children the supposed writings of men who did the same things twenty centuries ago. It was noticed that a large hole had been cut in the roof of the house. The attention of the owner being called to it, he visited the brothers and demanded to know why they had damaged his property. The elder brother replied: "I cut the hole so that we could see God without having to go out of doors." At this the owner decided they were insane. Yet he believes in the sanity of a Jewish gentleman called Moses who once went up a mountain for the alleged purpose of seeing God up there—and that, too, of seeing him exposed in a highly indecent manner.

Letters from Friends.

U. S. Military Home, Wis., Aug. 1, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I am delighted with the course the postmaster-general is pursuing in regard to Spiritualist mediums. He is cooking the goose of the administration and making smooth the road to victory of the G. O. D. (the good old Democratic) party in 1892. Let him go on, my friend, and Mr. Harrison's administration will fizzle out before the earth makes two more revolutions round the sun, and the Republican party will be buried beyond all hope of resurrection; as was the Whig party in 1852. I. C. B.

Grand Rapids, Mich., Aug. 9, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Has the Lord's inspector of post-offices been around New York yet? He has been to Grand Rapids, and don't you think, out of twenty-nine of his own children only seven were perfect enough to be trusted with the Lord's mail. If he should come to New York, I hope you (and all other cities) will make a note of his doings that we may hav some reliable statistics in regard to the Lord.

I understand the general opinion now is that the Lord did not appear at all at the Johnstown disaster, but was out on one of his summer vacations. Charles Saoh.

Crainville, Kan., Aug. 5, 1889.

Mr. Editor: We had J. E. Remsburg at Chester, who delivered his lecture on "Bible Morals." Christians are losing their grip, I think. They used to get hot at the mention of Freethought; now they shake their heads and hav little or nothing to say. They realize that the foundation is gone from under their system. The old ones will probably die in their old faith, but there is no hope of the rising generation to carry on the work, for they are listless and apathetic. "Hell" doesn't trouble them, and the joys of heaven hav no inducements for them. Yours truly, J. J. Wilkes.

Madison, Ga., Aug. 3, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Mr. L. J. Potts, who champions the ignorance of A. Wilford Hall, says in The Truth Seeker of June 29th: "He [Darwin] admits one miracle, a special creation of God to start animal life. And what is this but an admission that he did not know the origin of life? How could he know of a creation without either having a special revelation from God or being present at the occurrence?" It so happens that Darwin admitted no such thing, as every attentiv student of the great naturalist knows. If Mr. Potts will study Darwin more carefully he will correct his own error. A. A. Bell.

New York, Aug. 10, 1889.

Mr. Editor: As I see in The Truth Seeker of this day that you, as well as a great part of humanity, innocently mix God with Christ, allow me to make the following distinction, which I hope you will be good enough to publish in your next number.

Christ has nothing whatever to do with God, nor with any of the different ways employed by some clergymen to extort money from the poor and the ignorant; but, on the contrary, if it were in his power to stop such mercenary proceedings, which are in open contradiction to his teachings, he would hav done so long ago, even at the risk of being crucified again. If on the other hand God allows his ministers, etc., to make use of his name for those purposes, why should the innocent who is opposed to such speculations be blamed for the guilty? Justice demands that Christ, or Jesus Christ, be spared the sufferings of seeing his name associated in all mercenary proceedings, against which he has so much protested, and to stop which he lost his life.

A Friend of Justice.

Hay Springs, Neb., Aug. 8, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Our effort to colonize Liberals is meeting with considerable success, or at least is giving great promis. Our correspondence is large and is increasing among the Liberal classes.

Our worthy brother S. Decker, of Pleasanton, Kan., has paid us a visit, and looked over the field, and is greatly pleased with our country.

We are expecting W. F. Jamieson to be with us in the latter part of September, when we expect to devote about one week's labor to the interests of Universal Mental Liberty. And after harvest, when the farmers hav more money than at present, we expect to raise quite a subscription list for The Truth Seeker and other Liberal papers.

We would be pleased to hear from all Liberals who favor starting a colony of Liberals in a good, healthy country, where land is cheap and crops good and prospects flattering. Parties desiring a description of this part of the world will receive prompt replies if stamp accompanies inquiry.

Very respectfully, E. W. Miner.

Berlin, N. J., Aug. 5, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Postmaster-General Wanamaker is reported as saying that at the last election God counted the Prohibition votes. A man occupying the place of Wanamaker, with all the world looking at him, ought to keep somewhere in the vicinity of truth and common sense, and be able to prove where God is or that such a being exists before he attempts to make a politician of him and set him to counting votes. If man had ever had a wise creator there would never hav been any need of Prohibition votes nor any others, for then men would hav been wise and each man a law unto himself. I hav lived over eighty-eight years in this world; was taught when a child to believe in a being everywhere present, supreme in power, wisdom, love, and mercy, who loved us all so much that he numbered all the hairs of our heads and watched over us every moment for our good. I hav sought for such a God as sincerely and earnestly, I believe, as any other man that ever lived, and now while trembling at the brink of the grave I must say I am not aware of having ever discovered the footprints nor finger-marks of any such being on the earth. And as for the Bible that is said to hav been written by the inspiration of the divine being, it contains the most cruel, wrathful, revengeful, unmerciful, and unjust sentiments that I ever read, said to be denounced by this God against the creatures said to be made by him without their knowledge or consent.

Let Mr. Wanamaker attend to his regular business and leave God, if there is such a being, to attend to his, and not go beyond his knowledge.

I challenge Mr. Wanamaker to prove the existence of a supreme being, to prove that prayer is ever answered by such a being, or that any man will ever know any more after his brain is dead than he did a year before he was born.

Yours, J. Hacker.

Groveland Farm, July 27, 1889.

Mr. Editor: The Liberals of Forest Grove and vicinity are having a general awakening. On July 14th we had two very fine lectures by Mr. B. F. Underwood, of Chicago. Subject for afternoon, "The New Science and the Old Faith;" for evening, "Evolution vs. Revelation." Both were excellent, but the last was simply grand. Those who hav had the pleasure of hearing this eloquent speaker will appreciate the splendid intellectual treat we were honored with.

He paid his audience the handsome compliment of saying he had given them a deeper scientific lecture than he at first intended. On July 21st we had the pleasure of listening to W. S. Bell, of Chicago. He gave us one lecture, subject, "Liberty and Morality," in his happiest vein. He is a very talented, brilliant speaker, taking the brightest views of this life. There is too much of the "milk of human kindness" in his heart for the black horrors of hell and future punishments to maintain the slightest hold upon his genial, happy nature.

We had the honor of a very pleasant visit with him at Groveland Farm, and from our slight acquaintance should decide him to be a true man, a genial companion, and a steadfast friend.

We cordially recommend him to all Liberal friends, and hope to hav the pleasure of hearing him again in the near future. On the 4th of August the Liberals of this county will meet at Forest Grove at Vert's Liberal Hall for the purpose of organizing under the state Secular Union as the Washington county Secular Union, if that name meets the approbation of the majority of the Liberals present.

When we organize and elect officers for the ensuing year, I shall take pleasure in forwarding the minutes of the meeting for publication in The Truth Seeker, whose friendly face has been gladly welcomed to our fireside ever since the first copy was issued, and, like old wine, has improved with age. Our Liberal speakers are usually annihilated immediately after their departure here by some one of the numerous "sky-pilots" or "middle men" with which our valley is infested. But they, poor fellows, go right on, happily unconscious of their complete destruction. Pity a man doesn't know when he is dead.

What a grand stride Liberalism has taken here in the last ten years! Why, it is almost respectable to be a Liberal, or "Infidell"—with the accent on the last syllable, and two l's; it makes the word sound "meaner."

Ay, it must come! The tyrant's throne
Is crumbling, with our hot tears rusted;
The sword earth's mighty hav leant on
Is canker'd, with our heart's blood crusted.
Room! for the men of mind make way!
Ye robber rulers, pause no longer;
Ye cannot stay the opening day:
The world rolls on, the light grows stronger—
The people's advent's coming!

Yes, we are breathing in liberty and equality with every breath. Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

Mrs. Sarah C. Todd.

Lexington, Ky., July 24, 1889.

Mr. Editor: De Tocqueville speaks of a division of interests which ruined France. This country need not plead any such excuse. Although the selfish generally outnumber the just and benevolent, a little band of patriots can always be depended on to save liberty in moments of danger. The monsters ready to devour the poor must be outgeneraled, and that speedily, or the peace and safety of our country is at an end. Who will commence this holy work? Consummate skill, exquisit plans, are required.

"Limitation of thought—Agnosticism," begins where common sense stops. Common sense can guide us to the polar star, if there is anything there that an ordinary intellect can grasp. One thing that lessens our strength is the religious cuttle-fish at every corner, who threatens to seize us in his slimy arms. If there is anything worth knowing, or worth having, we ought to obtain it at once, and cease trifling. Religion has propped up tyranny to such an extent that all countries are weak and superannuated, and dare not say their souls are their own. A statesman, Wanamaker, givs consent, by silence, to the fiendish plans of public robbers, by the score, and walks meekly to Sabbath-school and informs young ladies that an infinit God with three heads (I hav seen such in some geography) once debauched a young girl, and left her in her misery; her husband threatened to "put her away;" there was a great fuss in the family, and so on to the end of the tale. He sees a poor, starving widow, scorns her, and goes home to an elegant dinner.

What do we know outside of ourselvs? Oh, we know what the preacher tells us about God—just that, and no more. Then the preacher is our God, to all intents and purposes. This nation is governed by what it learned at Sunday-school, and the Sunday law is slowly eating away its strength and moral courage. Hav we no dignity? Shall we not arise and put an end to such nonsense?

I heard a selfish, wealthy lady observe the other day that if she could only get inside heaven, she would hav nothing to do but enjoy herself. Her ticket to this place was the "death of Christ." See how her education and mental disciplin is thrown away, the pastor of her church developing her credulity and ignorance alone.

We hav evangelists here, and what a fog they are raising! They fight against the dictates of nature, which proceeding produces nothing but monstrosities. The unnatural idea of a "son of God" has been a "horror" on our planet. The mystery of the "father" has not saved the victims of the flood, so that we begin to think that God himself hardly knows enough to go in when it rains.

If God chasteneth his loved ones, we dare not repose in his arms; his anger repels us. But if the devil afflicts us, as some believe, he must usher us into heaven, and God is only entitled to a back seat. What a mist!

We are duly informed to-day that on Sunday night the police of Cincinnati raised a disturbance in a public garden there, attempting to drive out from the place quiet and harmless people. We are foolish slaves in this country. We are victims of the most ridiculous pestilence that ever afflicted human beings. Alhaza.

Chester, Neb., Aug. 6, 1889.

Mr. Editor: We write to tell you that we hav just had the pleasure of hearing J. E. Remsburg. Arrangements having been made to that effect, he came and gave us three lectures, "Bible Morals," "False Claims," and "The Sunday Question." The first he delivered at Chester, the last two at Hebron, towns twelve miles apart, and both boasting a large number of churches for their population. Naturally, we feared the people would not come out to hear, but we were agreeably surprised. They did come out, and judging by certain demonstrations, said demonstrations being clapping and stamping, there are a good many heretics among them. There was a large delegation from the country, of Mr. Remsburg's persuasion, and it was among these that he was made at home while here. Off the rostrum Mr. Remsburg is a quiet, unassuming gentleman. On the rostrum he is a strong and fearless speaker, making his points clear and keen; and to the orthodox he must seem an avenging Nemesis, for he piles one hard fact above another till he has a stack of them, gathered from unimpeachable authorities, many of them from the Bible itself. And in the case of Freethought vs. orthodoxy, nothing is so eloquent as a fact, because nothing is so unanswerable. In "Bible Morals" Mr. Remsburg arrays the Bible against itself. The result is not hard to guess. In "False Claims" he proves that most reforms hav been begun and carried on, not only outside of the church, but with the church opposing. In "The Sunday Question" he shows the absurdity and selfishness of the Blair bill, and proves beyond doubt that Sunday is not a divine institution. We hope to hav Mr. Remsburg with us soon again. Yours truly, Emily Burton.

Odessa, Mo., Aug. 4, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I am demonstrating to these people that there is one man in this country who is not ashamed or afraid to talk Freethought whenever and wherever it comes in the way. I am not afraid to show that I take and read The Truth Seeker; that I am an admirer of Robert G. Ingersoll (Bob Ingersoll, as they sneeringly call him), and that instead of being ashamed of Freethought sentiments I am proud of them. I am proud to own that I do not believe the old Jew book is the inspired word of God—a book containing such absurdities as that God created the heavens and the earth out of nothing; that he caused the earth to bring forth into a flourishing condition all vegetation, bearing fruit after its kind, before he made the sun, moon, or stars; that he made a full-grown man in less than a day, and a woman as an afterthought out of his rib; that he made this couple a garden, put them in it, told them they must not do what he knew they would do, and then cursed them and their posterity down through all ages for doing it—and oh, what a curse! Let us stop and weep awhile for the credulity, the gullibility, of man. A curse from which this infinitly wise and infinitly merciful God left no escape except that we must believe that his eternal son, in conformity to his eternal plan, came down from heaven and was, by an incomprehensible act or game of hocus-pocus played by one specified ghost and one specified virgin, conceived of this virgin and borne by this virgin; and was crucified by the Jews until he was dead, dead, dead, and was buried, buried, buried, for three days, then miraculously brought to life, was released from his tomb by supernatural power, visited some of his friends, conversed with them, and in a short time took flight on the wings of his godship to his old home and to his old father, who by the by is no older than himself, and is one with himself and that ghost. Let us weep again. Is there any wonder that a man should be proud that he does not believe such stuff as this? Very many let on to wonder at it, and I am persuaded that some do really wonder at it, and when I come to this point I feel like exclaiming, "O thou muttonhead, how I pity you and how I hate your seducers!" But when I come to reflect that four hundred millions of people stand ready to take a solemn oath that they do believe not only these few above-mentioned absurdities but thousands on thousands of others of a kindred kind, which may be regarded as a vast city of absurdities, with the old absurdity, the old master absurdity of all, hell and eternal punishment, standing like a stupendous Babel tower in its midst, my heart sickens, and if I thought it would do any good I would say, Let us pray. And I would pray, you can stake your life on that, but it would do no good. So I can see no help for it but just such as Freethinkers are bringing to bear, and I must confess it looks little to me. Wm. L. Worley.

ONONDAGA INSANE ASYLUM,
ONONDAGA HILL, N. Y., Aug. 6, 1889

MR. EDITOR: I send you herewith a clipping from the Syracuse Standard of August 5th, that gives an account of a case of religious mania. The man, Reuben Harvey, is now under my care in one of the disturbed wards of the Onondaga Asylum. He is rational upon all subjects, except religion, and though quite consistent upon this, he, like others who believe the Christian doctrin, can hardly be expected to be rational. The jargon with which he salutes all listeners within hearing contains the twang and all the nonsense of the enthused revivalist. The case of Reuben Harvey is a type that is often met with in asylums. It is an every-day occurrence in these institutions for men and women to state, with the utmost positivness, that God or Jesus has spoken to them.

Often they will declare that they represent these personages, and only a few weeks ago a man, subject to occasional attacks of mania, received a command from God to kill two persons to make, as he put it, an atoning sacrifice. His intended victims, however (one of whom was myself), objected to this; promptly restraining him by mild but effectiv measures.

Another man, who was a telegraph operator by trade, manifested his insanity by declaring that God had told him that electric lights were detrimental to health. Previous to the time that he was taken to an asylum, he deluged the national and state executivs and legislators with remonstrances, threats, and petitions for their suppression. I might go on and show scores of cases where religious belief and supposed inspiration were the most prominent features in cases of acute and chronic insanity. Not only does the revivalist find his intensified prototype within the walls of the insane asylum, but the more modern child of inspiration, the Spiritualist, finds his there also.

Upon the camp-ground of the Spiritualists, at Lake Pleasant, Mass., I hav met with the same kind of psychological phenomena that the asylums contain; just as sincere; often as intelligent; always wearing that "far-away look in the eyes," and possessed of the feeling that they partly liv in other worlds than ours. In my opinion the word inspiration has been the stumbling-block of many a brain. I was much pleased with the vigorous letter of J. M. Beall, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 3d. I shall be glad to see the time when some of the brilliant minds that espouse Freethought will cast from themselvs that wish-begotten belief in immortality that supports the fallacy of Spiritualism.

To-day the man that holds to a personal God is a timid Freethinker indeed, yet nearly all the Liberals of a few years ago held to the God idea. Let us hope that men who are to come will hav as much courage in their reasoning, and throw aside the baseless illusion of immortality.

Nature, in the positiv speech of her phenomena, proclaims to us that things around us only serve our wishes when we compel them by force to do so. It does not look likely to me that nature will pickle or embalm man's mind just because it is man's wish that his mind should last forever. If a man desires the pleasure to be derived from viewing a part of the earth from a mountain-top, he must climb the mountain or force some one to carry him to the top.

If he longs to visit the moon, nature, God, or anything else won't take him there just because he wants to go. Just so with regard to his immortality-longing. Nature works by a deeper mechanism than man's wishes. True enough, every vibration from the atom's movement to the surgings of sidereal systems is on record, in nature, and will continue on record forever; therefore the individual hereafter of the Christian or the Spiritualist is like the picture in bright colors to tickle a childish fancy, and not like the majestic panorama of reality into which the philosopher may work without hopes or fears, but with the confidence that any truth that he may find is a million times better than all man's hopes and all his dreams.

C. E. BOYNTON, B. S., M.D.

"Gabriel, blow thy trump! I, God, command it," uttered in a deep, hoarse voice, rang through the Zion African Methodist church at the services at 10:30 o'clock yesterday morning. Rev. M. H. Ross, the pastor, was preaching a sermon on "The Water of Life," when this interruption occurred.

The congregation was startled and frightened. "Gabriel, blow thy trump, I command you! Come, ye children, from the ends of the earth. Let the gates of hell be opened."

The speaker stood up in his pew, and was gesticulating wildly while he shouted. He was recognized by everyone as Reuben Harvey, a colored cook, who has housekeeping rooms in the Remington block. His sudden and crazy speech almost created a panic. Some people hastily left the church. Harvey, instead of growing calmer, repeated his words in louder tones. He was greatly excited and had evidently and all at once become insane. Finally two stalwart colored brothers led the lunatic from the church and sent for the ambulance. The ambulance not arriving at once, the men started at about 11 o'clock with the unfortunate man down East Washington street toward his home. A great crowd of men and boys gathered around and followed. Harvey kept his arms above his head and shouted commands to Gabriel all the way to South Salina street.

Harvey's rooms are on the top floor of the Remington block. When these rooms were searched the entrance door was found locked with a padlock.

"Open, Mary Magdalene, open unto me. I command it. Now I will show you doubters that I am God. Open the door, I say," screamed the crazy man. Then, without waiting, Harvey struck the door with all his power, rushed against it, and burst it open. His actions at church and on the streets attracted the attention of thousands of persons, many of whom supposed that the man was nothing more than one of the loose religious cranks of Syracuse.

Reuben Harvey is one of the best-known cooks of the city. He is rather small and slight of stature. He has lived a life consistent with his professions of strict temperance. He has always been a very religious man and has studied the Bible very closely when not at work. His former employers hav only the kindest things to say of him. Lately Harvey has grown more and more religious until he has stopped work to exhort. About six weeks ago his latest employer concluded that Harvey was ceasing to be valuable to him, and let him go.

During the past week Harvey is said to hav done little else but read his Bible. A Standard reporter went to Harvey's rooms in the Remington block at 11 o'clock last evening. Harvey was still shouting to Gabriel, commanding him to blow his trumpet, and ordering out "the golden chariot." Mrs. Harvey was alone with the lunatic. He should be immediately removed to an asylum. Mrs. Harvey, it is said, is in danger of being affected by the same delusions.

INDIAN GROVE, MO., July 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Self-interest prompts every intelligent, thinking individual to look as deep down into the great and grave problem of human destiny as his power of penetration will admit of his going. Though not altogether from selfish motivs, for we think candidly, we think seriously, in behalf of the entire human race, because evidently one common fate awaits them all. There is an intense desire in the human heart to know if there is a spirit in man that survives the dissolution of the body—the physical system that generates mind and spirit, if there be, in fact, such a thing as spirit aside from the breath of life that animates all living bodies. We hav all parted with dear friends, those we loved and who loved us. We hav stood by them when the turbid waters of the mystic river lashed the shore at their feet, with grief that chills the vital fluid of life, that paralyzes the pent-up emotions of our aching hearts until there is no power to giv utterance to our unspeakable sorrow. We hav beheld them fade from our view, and we are left on the strand of time, inconsolable, lonely, and sad. But their memory survives, enshrined in our hearts, ever sacred, and cherished by the enduring ties of our most ardent love and veneration. And if their spirits continue to exist in a conscious state,

> In some far-away clime,
> Unhurt by sorrow, undimmed by time, what would we not giv for some ocular demonstration of the fact that our lost ones liv? What would we not giv to know the conditions under which they exist, to know that we shall be permitted to meet them, and to recognize them as our own loved ones long lost; and be permitted to enjoy their presence forever? These and similar reflections produce a wholesome effect on the mind, teaching us to become more tolerant, to exercise more charity toward the diversified opinions entertained by others, and not to be hasty to impeach the motivs of others when they express what they claim to be their honest convictions relativ to this very interesting, and to me inexplicable, question.

Now, it must be evident that any system of religion that stultifies the intellect and perverts the judgment to the extent that its devotees are unable to conceive of the possibility of an individual holding views different from those entertained by themselvs and being at the same time equally conscientious and sincere, tends to ferment sedition, discord, and strife, and therefore is not entitled to the claim of divine inspiration. These obnoxious features are and always hav been characteristic of the Christian religion, and they hav always constituted a successful bar to the harmonious coöperation of all the members of society, so essential to the advancement of civilization and intelligence. If the Christian religion is the wisdom of God directing omnipotence in the unfolding of a scheme designed to harmonize the conflicting elements that rankle in the human breast, and thus restore peace on earth and good will among men, it certainly has proved the most dismal failure recorded in the annals of time. Now, if God has given to mankind a system of religion for their observance, a divine law to govern and control the actions of man, the prime object doubtless was to regulate the conduct of man in relation to his fellow-man; to inculcate proper conceptions of the duties and obligations of life; to imbue his mind with a real love for true practical charity; to qualify him for the honest, self-sacrificing labor of the philanthropist, and to elevate him and place him on a higher plane of moral and intellectual development—in a word, to make of him a better, nobler, and grander being than he could possibly become under any other conceivable circumstances. Will Christianity do this? The past history of the church is a negativ reply to this interrogation. Well, then, unless Christianity will make of an individual a better person than it is possible to be without it, it certainly has no claims either on our time or on our conscience and is not in any sense essential to our happiness and comfort, which things should be the chief end of human endeavor, the goal of our higher ambition.

Surely no one would be so egotistical as to claim that the so-called unregenerated man was incapable of forming as high and exalted a conception of moral excellence as the regenerated man. Whether this fact be admitted or not, it remains none the less true. And there is not one single moral work, of charity or love, or any good thing that makes man and woman truly good and useful, that man cannot perform in a state of unbelief and outside the pale of the church as effectivly as though he was the most devoted Christian on earth. In fact, as Mr. Washburn has said, all the good performed by the church is common to the principles of humanity found outside of the church, and that will continue to exist and influence men and women to noble acts of daring heroism and self-sacrificing devotion to the cause of humanity in ages to come, when the waning faith in Christianity has become as obsolete as the most antiquated of all the heathen mythologies known to man. Separate morality from Christianity and what hav you left? You hav left a bone of contention that the nations of earth hav been fighting about for the last nineteen hundred years; a bone that has been prolific of more bloodshed, carnage, contention, and strife—a greater source of misery, wretchedness, and woe—than any other one thing that has ever agitated the minds of men. By a careful analysis we find that Christianity is a compound, composed of morality and blind credulity or faith in supernaturalism. It is the cohesivness of morality that holds the fabric of church together in opposition to the adverse law of disintegration—which, however, is surely and steadily doing its fatal work, as evidenced by the universal decadence of faith throughout Christendom. The only thing pertaining to Christianity that has ever done the world any good is the morality that she inculcates. But when we consider that the church has always taught that man within and of himself is not capable of practicing the little good that he knows; that he is dependent on extraneous power and influences to prompt and move him to good works, and that a good work once accomplished is not meritorious in itself, we are almost constrained through the impetuosity of our indignation to pronounce the church an unmitigated curse.

I am aware that it is claimed by the nineteenth-century Christians that the true, genuin disciple of Christ does not and never did persecute for opinion's sake; that he adopts the motto and practices the principle, Do unto others as you would hav o hers do unto you. To the superficial observer the term Christian may appear somewhat ambiguous. Among all the multiplied parties and sects into which the religious world has been divided and subdivided, there are no two that can agree as to what constitutes a genuin Christian. The significance of the term can best be determined by time and location. During the Dark Ages, a period of time that embraces about twelve hundred and fifty years when the rack, the thumbscrew, and the iron boot were the arguments employed by Christians to win souls to Christ, the term Christian, wherever used, in any part of the world ruled by the triple-crowned despot of Rome, indicated an individual that believed in the divine inspiration of the scriptures; that conformed strictly to the rites and ceremonies of the church as he understood them to be defined and set forth in the inspired volume; that recognized the pope as the vicegerent of God and the infallible head of the church militant, whose sovereign prerogativ it was to command, while it was his own imperativ duty to obey. However, we find at a period of more recent date this type of character branded as that of the basest and most dangerous of heretics by the pious and most devout puritanical bigots that infested society in the neighborhood of New Salem and other contiguous localities throughout the New England states. To this beautiful, fertil country, the typical land of corn and wine, the refugees from Christian, intolerant Europe hav fled, from home and friends and the land of their nativity, to escape the rigorous religious persecutions waged against them by those that preach the doctrin of peace on earth and good will among men, to set up for themselvs and establish on a firm basis an ecclesiastic despotism flagrant in fiendish barbarism, and that would hav been unsurpassed for cold-blooded atrocity by the Spanish Inquisition in her palmiest days had not the less intolerant government of Protestant Britain, from which these social vampires had fled, restrained and held them in check by the fear of her military power. In those days the term Christian indicated a character in many respects opposit and irreconcilably opposed to what constituted a recognized Christian in the more remote period to which I hav referred. We might proceed to greater length. But it would be superfluous, as you hav already concluded that the Christian is an individual who practices the rites and ceremonies of the church as he understands them to be set forth in the Bible. But these sophisticated equivocators cannot deny that during the Dark Ages faith in the Bible was universal. It was the guiding star of every man's life. There was no opposition that assumed the proportions of a formidable antagonist. The teaching of the Bible or the church was the rule of faith and practice. The words of Christ were the paramount authority, and when, in secret conclave in some remote, gloomy recess of the monastery, the chosen followers of Christ, the self-constituted vindicators of heaven's justice, assembled in solemn council deliberating on the shortest, surest, and most convenient method of disposing of heretics, those by whom their God had been offended and themselvs completely outraged, it was remembered that Christ in the plenitude of his mercy had said, "It were better that a millstone was hanged about his neck and he were drowned in the depth of the sea." This settled it. In fact, under the circumstances this was considered the most convenient and the most expeditious manner of disposing of the case. In confirmation of the justice of the final decision they read the significant expression of St. Paul, "I would that they were cut off, those that trouble you." Also, "If an angel from heaven preach any other gospel, let him be accursed." But to cap the climax, to settle any misgivings that would arise in the event that father or mother, or perchance an only child, should be numbered with the transgressors, the venerable saint, acting the role of prosecuting attorney for the kingdom of righteousness, read in measured, sepulchral tones, "He that will not hear this prophet shall be cut off from among his people;" "Bring hither these my enemies that would not that I should rule over them [those that talked of freedom, loved humanity, and resisted the tyrant] and slay them before me." With the foregoing, supplemented with, "Whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as unto the Lord," they proceed at once with alacrity and delight to execute the sentence passed by an ecclesiastic tribunal, composed, not only of believers, but of genuin Christians, presided over by the inspired word of the Lord. The term Christian is not a misnomer. They hav vindicated their claim to the title by a rigid adherence to the teaching of the Bible. They hav been directed by the dictum of the Holy Ghost, and should be taken in full fellowship by the nineteenth-century Christians. What will be the universal verdict pronounced by all intelligent, justice-serving, liberty-loving men and women when they shall hav become thoroughly conversant with the pernicious influence that Christianity has exerted on mankind?

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Found Asleep.

The summer sun is shining high,
And yet the carrier stays;
The burning noon comes farther on—
What is it thus delays
The brawn old horse and nimble wheels
With that true, patient man,
Who daily brings the tide of mail,
A government veteran?
Look down the lane, and o'er the field;
He must be coming now—
The sunshine in his honest face,
The damp curls on his brow.

Oh, dear! how anxious we hav grown!
What can hav happened on
That plain, short road while here I wait
A letter from my John?
And now the sun is nearly set;
No mail may come to-day;
He never, never stays so long,
Nor loiters on his way.
But winter morns and summer eves
He's out upon the road,
The pleasant word and cheery smile
On everyone bestowed.

But see! across the prairies there,
A stranger driving down;
I wonder if a messenger
Is coming from the town?
Yes! 'tis the mail-bags in his cart;
Some one is ill, I know,
When that most loyal friend of ours
Could keep us waiting so;
And we in such a mad suspense,
A whole day come and gone,
With melancholy tears fast shed
To hear from "Papa John."

"Good morning, stranger! walk right in,
Please, sir, and hav this chair,
And tell us why this summer morn
The dusty mails you bear.
Has aught of harm o'ertaken him
Who always came so true,
And halted not in rain nor shine,
As many others do?
But, ah! there's something in your eyes,
You turn away your face;
I feel vague fears within my heart
To see you in his place.

"Pray tell me, do: 'tis hard to bear
This dull uncertain dread—
Man! what is this wild tale you bring?
That little carrier dead?"
Found all alone this lovely morn
Wrapped in a peaceful sleep,
As though he dreamed such pleasant dreams
'Twere wrong almost to weep.
Yet we may cherish all the good
He did while he was here;
Death is the guest who comes to all,
A presence none may fear.

Frenchtown, Neb. MARY BAIRD FINCH.

The President's Cow.

A nativ and old resident of Washington tells the following anecdote which was current and credited in Washington during the brief administration of President Harrison, who was called the "Cincinnatus of the West" by the Whigs, and "Granny Harrison" by the Democrats. When he came to Washington to be inaugurated, no one was surprised at the plain looks and the simple manners of the old hero, because the pictures of the log cabin in which he had lived were common during the campaign as illustrating his simple habits. No, nor were they incredulous of the story soon heard of him.

It seems that there was no cow—or no satisfactory cow—at the White House, so the old ex-farmer made inquiries, and learned that Saturday was the day when the drovers came in from the country to the Marsh market to sell their cattle. Consequently, early on Saturday morning, President Harrison, instead of sending a servant, arose and walked down to the market. There he found cows "galore!"

He soon made a trade with a burly Montgomery county drover, by which he became the possessor of a fine Durham.

"Where shall I drive it, sir?" inquired the drover, who did not recognize the president.

"To the White House. I will show you the way," replied President Harrison.

"Why, you don't mean to say, friend, that you've brought this yere beast for old Granny Harrison?" demanded the drover with dilated eyes.

"Yes," replied the old hero, without showing the resentment that a smaller man might hav thought necessary.

The drover left his cattle in the care of his son and turned the Durham out on the avenue, where he and the president walked side by side behind the cow, guiding her way. The president on the inside gently raised his stick when Sukey made an effort to promenade the sidewalk, and the drover flourished his whip when she threatened to break into the middle of the street.

"I'm a Democrat myself," the drover volunteered to inform his companion, "and voted for old Van, of course; but the other day at the 'nauguration—ha! ha! ha!—I'll be doggoned if I didn't fling up my hat and hurrah for Granny Harrison with the best on 'em! Couldn't help it, somehow."

"Thank you," said the president.

"Oh, you're a Whig! But I might a known that by your having a siteration in the White House, as I s'pose you hav, hain't you?"

"Yes," said the president.

"What be you there, now? Gardener?"

"No."

"Coachman, then, or body servant?"

"Neither. I suppose I may call myself a general servant."

"Oh, yes! Run errands, wait on the table, answer the door-knocker, and like o' that," remarked the drover, who had no idea of what the domestic establishment of the president of the United States was like.

"Something not very unlike that," said the president, with a tolerant smile.

"Do you see much of Granny Harrison, now?" inquired the man, as they neared the White House grounds.

"Considerable," said the president.

"How do you like the old fellow?"

"That's hard to tell. Too well, most likely," thoughtfully replied the old hero.

"I'll go bail you do!"

"Well, here we are," said the president, opening a gate that led to the stables.

Several men-servants came forward, touching their hats.

"Take charge of this cow and attend to her!" ordered the president.

Then, turning to the drover, he said: "Come, friend! Come into the house and take some breakfast."

"Thanky! I don't care if I do! Say, could you get me a sight of old Granny Harrison?"

"Didn't you see him at the inauguration?"

"Lor', yes! but not nigh enough to know what he looked like! I would like to get a squint at him, anyways!"

"Come in, friend," said the old soldier, leading the way up the steps and through the south door, into the mansion.

The drover turned around and looked out upon the extensiv grounds, and then remarked:

"A better place than that ar log cabin out in Ohio!"

"I don't know," replied the old soldier, leading the way along the hall.

Here they were met by a servant dressed like a clergyman, who bowed and opened a door to the left. The president ushered his guest into the family breakfast-room, where breakfast was standing ready.

"Lor'-a-mighty! what a sight of silver and chiny!" exclaimed the drover, gazing on the glittering service. Here were more servants, who, with deep bows, placed chairs to the table.

"Sit down, friend!" said the illustrious host, politely indicating a chair.

"Look a here! I say, now! Ain't you taking on a great liberty? Granny Harrison wouldn't like this here now, would he?" inquired the drover, puzzled and hesitating.

"I think he would, very much. Pray sit down."

"Now, just look here, now! Ain't you too fresh?" inquired the drover, with his hands on the back of the chair, which, for some reason or other, he did not take. "Who be you, anyhow, as makes so bold and takes sich liberties in the president's house? You ain't told me your name, nor likewise your siteration here as givs you so much freedom."

"The people call me William Henry Harrison, and hav made me president of the United States," quietly replied the ex-farmer.

"Lord almighty!!!" cried the drover, and he bolted from the house and never stopped running until he was off the grounds, and when he sat down on the curbstone, "he cussed himself gray!" as his wife said.

Correspondence.

NEOLA, IA., Aug. 7, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write you a few lines to let you know how I was getting along. We traded our farm near Tilden, Neb., for a store and stock of hardware and furniture in Neola, Ia. We moved here the 1st of March, and I went to school two months and school closed till the 1st of September. We had a very hard rain this forenoon, and it was so dark that we could not see to do anything in the house. Well, I will stop for this time.

Yours truly, GEORGE WHITNEY.

ROSE, MICH., Aug. 7, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to the Corner. I am ten years old. I go to school, and study arithmetic, writing, spelling, geography. I liv with my grandpa. He takes THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I take much delight in looking at the pictures and reading the letters in the Corner. I would be glad to receive a visit from you or any of my little friends. My grandpa is a Freethinker all the way through, and you would be very welcome.

Yours, with respect,

OAK MILLS, KAN., Aug. 6, 1889.

MISS WIXON, Kind Friend: The Children's Corner in the last TRUTH SEEKER (August 3d) was a good one. Your article on "One Day's Outing" was read with exquisit pleasure. The little poem by Louis N. Crill was very beautiful and touching, and the "Words of Wisdom" from the brilliant pen of Thomas Jefferson helped to make the Corner valuable and instructiv. I hope all the young Liberals will take an interest in your work, and do all they can to show their appreciation of your efforts in their behalf. Heston's picture of the Johnstown flood was a good one. I will write something for the Corner as soon as convenient. Always your friend,

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

[We are very grateful for the above kind appreciation of our efforts. If there were more such young men as our friend George in every community, the world would be the better for it.—ED. C. C.]

Spiders.

You call a spider an ugly, dirty thing. That's because you never hav examined one very minutely. Just look at one—four pairs of legs and two claws on each foot, though some hav but one and others more. There are seven joints in the leg—one or two can be dropped upon occasion, but new joints will grow again. The spider has six or eight eyes, and can see all ways. He has a mustache on his upper lip, see? and pretty little fangs, and a very sharp hook on one, which he generally carries doubled up, but when he wants to fight, or catch a fly, out comes this weapon, at the end of which is the mouth of a duct of a poison gland. He has a fine sense of touch in his feet, and a delicate nervous system. His blood is white and his liver is large and yellow. He has a heart and respiratory organs, although you might think him quite heartless when he coaxes a harmless miller into his parlor but to devour him for dinner. He is a spinner by trade. He has a wonderful apparatus for spinning, glandular tubes and follicles in the center of the abdominal region, varying from a hundred to a thousand.

Did you ever see a spinning spider? Just watch one and note how elegantly he builds his home. With what accuracy he spins and fastens his threads of silk! The ingenuity displayed by spiders in making their web houses is remarkable, and shows marked intelligence. Spiders descend by their silken one-string ladder head-downward, and roll their threads in a bundle as they go upward. They can go from bush to bush, from building to build ing, by their tight rope, made as they go along.

Spiders are very kind to their babies and guard them carefully in infancy, which kindness is often repaid when they are grown up by the children eating their fathers and mothers.

There are several varieties of spiders, the meanest of which is the wolf spider, which makes no web, but prowls about in the nighttime, hiding in holes in the ground, and seeking whom he may devour. The "daddy long-legs" is a species of the spider family, but he is harmless. Some other kinds are very poisonous. In the South there is a kind of spider that the Indians eat, and call delicious food, as well as ascribing to it medicinal properties. The tarantula is a very large and poisonous spider living in California and Texas, and other Southern localities.

Yes, you can tame spiders and make great pets of them. There was a prisoner once in the Bastile by the name of Pelisson, who made friends with a spider, who came at the response of a call from a flute to feed on the flies that Pelisson caught for him. Thus the prisoner passed many otherwise tedious hours.

Once a man in France kept eight hundred spiders in an apartment, and they were made very tame and gentle. He kept them for the silk that they made, for they can make silk, although not so well as the silkworm of commerce. If you examin their silk you will perceive it is exceedingly fine and strong. Astronomers use it for dividing the micrometer. The threads are very delicate, and it takes four million strands to make a filament as large as a human hair.

The spider can build bridges and take himself wherever he pleases. He can spin a rope and swing himself for hours at the end of it. He is cleanly in his habits, and if you let him stay in the house he will destroy insects, and make himself as useful as he can.

Does he think and reason? It seems to me he must, after a fashion. He is affectionate, betrays fear and anger, and is an excellent warrior, and uses art and deception when inveigling an innocent fly into his apartment.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Describe the spider. What is his trade and occupation? Describe the way he builds his home as you hav seen it. How do spiders propel themselvs? What about babies by spiders? Are there many varieties of spiders? Which is the meanest? Is the "daddy long-legs" a spider? Are spiders ever eaten for food or medicin? What do you know about the tarantula? Can spiders be tamed? What did Pelisson do with a spider? Where was Pelisson then? Can you tell anything of the Bastile? What do spiders make? Are they builders, too? What use do astronomers make of spiders' threads? How many threads does it take to make a strand as large as a human hair? Of what use is the spider in the house? Do you believe the spider thinks and reasons?

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

THE STRUGGLE
FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

The Light of the World.

FROM A COLLECTION OF SONGS USED BY THE MINNEAPOLIS SECULAR SOCIETY.

The whole world was dark until science came in;
The light of the world is science.
Like sunshine at noonday its glory shone in;
The light of the world is science.

CHO.—Come to the light, 'tis shining for thee:
Sweetly its light has dawned upon me,
Once I was blind, but now I can see;
The light of the world is science.

No darkness hav we who in science abide,
The light of the world is science.
We walk in the light when we follow our guide,
The light of the world is science.

Ye dwellers in darkness with myth blinded eyes,
The light of the world is science.
Throw off superstition and open your eyes,
The light of the world is science.

No need of the creed-lights to lead as of old,
The light of the world is science.
For nature shows truths more precious than gold,
The light of the world is science. —Reason.

Evolution.

What a wonderful problem is human life!
How strange, beyond all thought,
Are the changes that evolution
In its magic whirl hath wrought!

Whole races of beings perished
Before man saw the light,
And his origin and history
Runs backward into the night.

Men spring forth out of the darkness
Like sparks from the smitten steel
And drift back into the darkness—
Their destiny who shall reveal!

The air we breathe is laden
With atoms that lived of yore.
And the atoms that liv in our bodies to-day
May hav served the same purpose before.

Then round in an endless spiral
The tide of being flows,
And the blood that runs in your veins to-day
Perhaps may hav blushed in the rose.

Not a single leaf that falls to the ground
But lends its life to some other tree;
So I wait my lot in humble trust,
For God knows best what is best for me.

—Livy Penny in the Mount Desert Herald.

Why People Go to Church.

Some go to church, just for a walk,
Some to stare, to laugh, and talk.
Some go there to meet a friend;
Some their idle time to spend.
Some for general observation;
Some for private speculation,
Some to seek or find a lover;
Some a courtship to discover.
Some go there to use their eyes,
And newest fashion criticise.
Some to show their own smart dress;
Some their neighbors' to assess.
Some to scan a robe or bonnet;
Some to price the trimming on it.
Some to learn the latest news,
That friends at home they may amuse.
Some to gossip, false and true,
Safe hid within the sheltering pew.
Some go there to please the squire;
Some his daughters to admire.
Some the parson go to fawn;
Some to lounge and some to yawn.
Some to claim the parish doles;
Some for bread and some for coals.
Some because it's thought genteel;
Some to vaunt their pious zeal.
Some to show how sweet they sing;
Some how loud their voices ring,
Some the preacher go to hear,
His style and voice to praise or jeer.
Some forgivness to implore,
Some their sins to varnish o'er,
Some to sit and doze and nod,
But few to kneel and worship God.

Darwin and His Neighbors.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

I was fossil-hunting the other day, writes a correspondent, in a chalk-pit near Keston, when a thunderstorm forced me to take shelter in a shed, where I had an interesting conversation with two old workmen. "Do you find many fossils here?" I asked. "Yes, sometimes we git one or two, then we maybe find a lot more of the same sort near it. Gentlemen comes along about every two days and picks 'em over. I found some shark's teeth once. Mr. ——, at Bromley, said they was mammon's [mammoth's!] teeth, but I took 'em to Sir John Lubbock and Mr. Darwin and they both said they were shark's as soon as they saw 'em. Maybe you've heard of Mr. Darwin?" "Yes, I hav heard of him. Did the people around here often take things to him?" "Sometimes, when they wanted to know what anything was. He could always tell 'em. Master Frank will now if you go to him; he's very clever." "I once took a effet [eft—a lizard] to Sir John," chimed in his comrade. "I killed it up yonder by the barn. Bob saw it first, but he was frightened. He'd been boozing for a week, and would 'a been scared at anything. It was about that length [about a foot], and Mr. —— telled me to tek it straight down to Sir John, it hed such eyes. I went into Sir John's room; he was at home; but he couldn't tell me what it was. 'Wait a bit here,' he said, 'and I'll look at my books.' So he went out for about a quarter of an hour. His room was full of all sorts of things—lizards, toads, vipers, and nearly everything. When he came back he told me what it was, and gave me half a sovereign. 'That's the male,' he said; 'you'll find the female near the same spot.'" "Which Sir John was that?" "That was old Sir John. I took a pair of live effets once down to young Sir John. Sir John as is; the one as knows a lot about ants."

Stop It.

From the National Economist.

While numbers of our citizens are flattering themselvs that they are relieved from the support of an enormous standing army, which burden so afflicts the unfortunate people of European monarchies, it may be of interest to them to note the following figures: According to the statistical abstract for 1887, prepared by the bureau of statistics under the direction of the secretary of the treasury, the net ordinary expenditures of the nation for 1887 were $220,190,602.72. Of this amount $38,561 025 85 went for the army, and there was $75 020.101.79 paid in pensions, and $15,141,126.80 paid for the navy. This makes a total expenditure of $128,731,254 44, showing about sixty per cent of the total ordinary expenditure to hav gone into the military establishment. Now let us compare these figures with the amounts expended by the great powers of Europe on their armies and navies. Russia expends on both $165,500,000, or about thirty-five per cent of her ordinary expenditures; France, $144,000,000, or twenty-four per cent; Great Britain, $130,000,000, or thirty-one per cent. The others in smaller proportions. Since this report of the treasury department vastly increased appropriations hav been made for the navy and for pensions, the pension appropriation last year being almost ten millions more than for the year cited, and likely to be increased by the next Congress. This shows our expenditure on what is the equivalent of the European standing armies to be almost double that of the most powerful autocratic nation on earth, and more than double that of the two leading powers of the continent, while it is almost double the expenditure of Great Britain, and was during the last fiscal year more than double. This being the case, where hav we the grounds on which to base our self-gratulation? This is only one of the instances in which our people deceive themselvs, and close investigation of all existing conditions will show that this is really a small imposition when the entire account is made up. It is well enough to feel a reasonable pride in our institutions; but it is not best to take the rhetorical declarations of office-seeking demagogs for establishing a fact and howl ourselvs hoarse over a triumph that only exists in imagination. First investigate, prove that a claim is true, before giving away to frantic demonstrations. So far as financial oppression goes, there is no people on earth much more severely burdened than those same Americans, and the only difference in the oppression here and elsewhere is that it is done more nicely and ingeniously. Indeed, it is accomplished with so much skill and delicate nicety that it somewhat resembles the modern manner of amputating a limb, which is done before the patient discovers it, but he is a cripple for life although he escaped immediate pain.

A Union of Church and State.

From the Chicago Morning News.

I am informed that upon each monthly payday of city employees, especially the police, there is to be found at the city hall and the police pay-stations from one to half a dozen nuns, or sisters of charity, seated at a convenient point where the men hav to pass after receiving their pay, and into whose open palms each employee is expected to drop a portion of his salary as he passes out. To giv the affair an air of authority, so far as the police are concerned, the police captain often acts as chaperon to these nuns, standing guard to see who contributes. Of course, the patrolman, knowing the eagle eye of his captain is upon him, and not wishing to incur his displeasure, stands and delivers for the benefit of the Roman Catholic church.

As the writer is not a member of any church, and does not believe in the union of church and state, even indirectly, he fails to see the justice of this bleeding operation. But, if it be right and proper, then where in the name of all that's great and good are the other churches, such as the Episcopal, Congregationalist, Baptist, Methodist, Lutheran, etc., that they are not represented each payday by begging committees, that they may receive their share of the city taxes? They surely need not be at all backward in going into the scheme, as we hav a Protestant mayor—at least he is supposed to be one, being away up high in Freemasonry, an institution that comes in quite often for a scoring from the Roman Catholic church. It is therefore supposable that he would make no serious objection to the Protestant churches coming in on the "stand and deliver" racket.

If the present state of affairs is kept up it probably won't be long before our city authorities adopt the plan of the Pennsylvania coal barons, by putting the Roman Catholic church's share in a separate envelope, leaving the poor devil of an employee to accept what is left, and for the same reason, too—viz., so that the priests will hold their flocks in line for the powers that be.

No person in this enlightened age can object to anyone giving whatever he may please to the church of his choice, but to subject men, because they are employees of the city and paid by public funds, to running the gauntlet of a horde of church mendicants should not be tolerated in free America for an instant.

AMERICUS.

Why Are They Arming?

From the British American Citizen.

British American Citizen: In your last two numbers, under the heading of "A Menace to the Nation," you call the attention of your readers, as you hav repeatedly done before, to the great number of Roman Catholic military organizations throughout the country, and express surprise that they should be permitted to exist, considering the fact that their allegiance is to a foreign power, also that they are made up of the most inflammable and most ungovernable portions of our foreign population.

It certainly is a wonder to every thinking mind cognizant of the fact that these organizations are allowed to exist and to drill and parade right before us. We naturally ask the question: "Why these preparations in our midst in a time of peace? and what is the necessity for this class of aliens in our land being educated in a knowledge of the use of arms any more than the loyal American citizen?" Those of us who hav not forgotten the words of Monsignor Capel at Chicago, that "ere long they would send bullets to the government agents rather than pay taxes," and similar expressions from other prominent members of this political religious body, are likely to look upon these military companies with some degree of apprehension, believing that the men just quoted will be only too glad to make good their words when the favorable opportunity occurs—that opportunity which they seem to be looking for and making preparations for, and when, Lieutenant-Colonel Amyot of Canada says, they will be ready "to guard their institutions." . . .

Boston, July 11th. AMERICAN.

Canada.

From the Argonaut.

The French Canadians of the province of Quebec are resisting any attempt to compel the schools of the province to receive aid from the government to teach English. The Roman Catholic church, in the arrogance of its majority in the English province, refuses to permit the English language to be taught in its free schools. Political insolence could be carried to no further extent, and we know that whenever the time shall come that the church of Rome can marshal a majority of Roman Catholic votes in any state of the American Union, under the direction of clerical influence, a mode will be found to destroy our American system of non-sectarian free schools. There is a religious war, almost a race war, now existing on the other side of our Canadian line. A similar calamity to our country we are desirous of avoiding.

Ignorant, and Needs History.

From the American Sentinel.

The Overton (Neb.) Clipper has the following in reference to some lady who is securing signatures to the remonstrance against the Blair bill and kindred measures:

What lunatic asylum has broken loose? Last Sunday an old woman was in town with a petition to Congress to not make a church and state government of the United States.

To this the Phelps county Herald replies as follows:

Evidently the above paper favors a church and state government. If so, it does not realize its position. Better study history a little better, and see what hav been the terrible results of a union of church and state in the past. All honor to the "old woman" who is contributing her mite toward keeping church and state forever separate.

A FEW stand motionless, and, not seeking to lead themselvs or others out of the maze, laugh at the failures of their brethren, yet with little reason; for more grossly than the most bewildered wanderer does he err who never aims to get right. It is more honorable to the head, as well as to the heart, to be misled by our eagerness in the pursuit of truth than to be safe from blundering by contempt of it. The happiness of mankind is the end of virtue, and truth is the knowledge of the means, which he will never seriously attempt to discover who has not habitually interested himself in the welfare of others.—Coleridge.

MANKIND are the greater gainers by suffering each to liv as seems good to himself, than by compelling each to liv as seems good to the rest.—J. S. Mill.

WHAT I must do is all that concerns me, and not what people think. This rule, equally arduous in actual and intellectual life, may serve for the whole distinction between greatness and meanness. It is the harder, because you will always find those who think they know what is your duty better than you know it. It is easy in the world to liv after the world's opinion; it is easy in solitude to liv after your own; but the great man is he who, in the midst of the crowd, keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of solitude.—Emerson.

CONVICTIONS are generally first impressions sealed with later prejudices.—Meredith.

IN a time of ignorance, people do not doubt, even when they are doing the worst harm: in a time of enlightenment, they hesitate even when they are achieving the greatest benefits.—Montesquieu.

PHILOSOPHY, by carrying certainty with it to a given length, and pointing out real difficulties where that certainty ends, is ever mild in its features and tolerant in its tone; on the other hand, the more implicitly we bow to authority, the less tolerant we become to those who choose not to bow as obediently as ourselvs. The mind always seizes with a kind of convulsiv grasp those truths for which it can giv no very satisfactory account, as though the tenacity with which they are held would go to make up the deficiency in their evidence; and on this ground it is that those who are most ignorant, to prevent the appearance of absurdity, commonly find it necessary to be most dogmatical. On the other hand, an abundance of knowledge and a strength of evidence, as they define more clearly the bounds of the known and the unknown, tend perpetually toward toleration.—Morell's History of Philosophy.

CHRISTIANITY boasts of procuring men a happiness unknown to preceding ages. It is true, the Greeks know not the divine rights of tyrants and usurpers. Under paganism, it never entered the head of any man to suppose that it was against the will of heaven for a nation to defend themselvs against a ferocious beast, who had the audacity to lay waste their possessions. The religion of the Christians was the first that screened tyrants from danger, by laying down as a principle that the people must renounce the legitimate defense of themselvs.—D'Holbach.

BUT for her utility as a state engin, Christianity would not now rule the land. But that she furnished a tool to the hands of power, she had, ere this, followed the fate of her more classic predecessors, the mythologies of Greece and Rome. But that it was found convenient to rule the ignorant mind through its superstitious fears, those fears had long since been dispelled.—Robert Dale Owen.

IN an ignorant and barbarous age, military success is preferred to all other kinds of fame.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

WARS, like assassinations, will be ranked in the number of those daring atrocities, humiliating and loathsome to nature, and which fix upon the country or the age whose annals are stained with them, an indelible opprobrium.—Condorcet.

As many customs deemed right by our ancestors appear detestable to us, so many customs which we think proper our more civilized descendants may regard with aversion.—Spencer.

WHO at the present day can imagin the courage, the devotion to principle, the intellectual and moral grandeur, it once required to be an Infidel, to brave the church, her racks, her fagots, her dungeons, her tongues of fire—to defy and scorn her heaven and her hell—her devil and her God? They were the noblest sons of earth. They were the real saviors of our race, the destroyers of superstition, and the creators of science. They were the real Titans who bared their grand foreheads to all the thunderbolts of all the gods.—Ingersoll.

A LITTLE girl in Albany whose family was about to move to New Jersey, and who had heard Jersey spoken of as a forlorn and particularly God-forsaken place, was saying her prayers at her mother's knee the night before their intended departure. She said all that had ever been taught her, and then with peculiar emphasis and solemnity added: "And now, good-bye, God, for to-morrow we go to New Jersey."

MADE HIM DOWNHEARTED.

"IT always sort o' makes me feel sad and downhearted to read about the prodigal son in the Bible," said Farmer Silkens to his male offspring who was home on his summer vacation.

"Y-a a-s?"

"Yaws," echoed the old man as his lips curled contemptuously, "he came back and says honorable and flat-footed, 'I've done wrong an' I want another chance.'"

"Y-a-a-s."

"Yaws; he didn't come back to the farm pizenin' the very butterflies with the smoke from the sigereets an' say: 'Pops, ole boy, I'm dead broke; couldn't you let me hav a twenty to keep up my end with the fels at the club?' Not much he didn't."

And the old man heaved a sigh and went out to feed the hogs.—Merchant-Traveler.

Who won't refuse
To make and mend
Both boots and shoes.
His leather is good,
His work is quick,
His profits are small,
So he can't giv tick.
And when he dies
He fears no coals,
As he has saved

JOHNNY'S COMPOSITION ON THE IRISH.

THE Irish is quere folks. They is always mad at everybody til they gets everything they wants, an' then they stays mad 'cause every other Irishman ain't got everything too. They don't like to do much 'cept hold offises. Sometimes they try doin' other things, but they soon gets tired and strikes. In Ireland they is always fightin' the government, but here they does most of the governin' themselvs, and there ain't anybody to fight 'cept each other, so they fights each other. When one lot thinks one way, and another lot thinks another way, they call themselvs factshuns, and then these factshuns lay for each other on dark nights. Dockter Cronin ought to a stayed in on dark nights. Irishmen call theirselvs Irish-Americans, but Irish girls call theirselvs plane Americans. When you advertise for an American girl to do house-work, it's always an Irish girl that comes. They is all nice at first, but I guess house-work must be awful hard, 'cause they get awful ugly about it awful soon. When they gets mad you just got to grin and bare it, 'cause the policemans is always cousins of the girls, and the magistrates is cousins to the policemans, and there ain't any use tryin' to get ahead of such big families. Irish folks say that in the ole country they gets trod on, but I guess there must be some mistake about that. They ain't the kind what gets trod on. Maybe, though, the English is recklesser than Americans. But that can't be, because the Americans ain't 'fraid of the English, an' they is 'fraid as death of the Irish. When an American man talks about the English he talks loud, but when an American man talks about the Irish he lowers his voice just like us boys do when we talks about the schoolmaster. When an Irish boy gets mad at an American boy he don't do nothin' but swear until a good while after that when there's a lot of Irish boys together an' they ketch the American boy alone. Then the American boy has to run. Maybe American mans remember how it was when they was boys, and that is why they is so careful. Irish boys don't play like other boys. They don't see any fun in anything 'cept hollerin' at nice people and breakin' Chinymans windows. I don't see any fun in that. It makes folks feel bad to be hollered at, an' Chinymans like nice windows just the same as other people. I can't make out Irish boys or Irishmen either. They is quere folks.—Western American.

The area of North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington is equal to the combined area of the German empire, Great Britain and Ireland, the Netherlands, and Switzerland, the former being 361,588 square miles and the latter 361,500 square miles. A young man, aged twenty-one, committed suicide at Leeds, England, after writing this letter: "I am going to commit suicide on Friday morning, as I want to be buried on bank holiday [Monday], so that I shall disappoint my cousin Annie, who is to be married on that day, so there will be a funeral instead of a wedding. I hope you will attend my funeral. I will meet you in heaven."

About forty thousand persons visited the celebrated shrine of Knock, Ireland, on the 15th. The vast throng participated in the customary devotions. Several masses were celebrated, followed by a procession, the spectacle being most elaborate. Archdeacon Kavanagh, the central figure, was assisted by several clergymen, including two American priests. In the evening benediction was given to a large number of pilgrims from England, America, and Scotland.

Is a dream a sign of anything? Why, yes, undoubtedly. It is a sign of life in the dreamer, and that he is not asleep all over. Some of the organs of the complex brain are activ, carrying on the process of thought without guidance of the will. A dream is simply the result of unguided mental action, and the nature of the dream depends on what portion of the brain is activ. There is probably nothing more superhuman in a dream than in a reverie, or even in the incoherent imaginings of an insane person.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

The shrine at Auriesville, N. Y., erected three years ago, has yearly attracted increasing numbers to the spot, on the banks of the Mohawk. Thither, for more than two years, pious pilgrims hav wended to offer prayer and sacrifice and secure the intercession of the martyrs. It is said that great spiritual profit has been reaped by hundreds on these occasions. It is estimated that fifteen thousand people hav visited this shrine, that bids fair to become historic. On the 11th a pilgrimage went from Cohoes, and a party also went from Albany and other river points.

The Rev. Henry Montgomery, a negro preacher, was shot the other night in a corn field near Angier's Spring, Ga., by Amos Johnson, an old negro who was employed to watch the field. Johnson called on the preacher a few days ago and told him that somebody was stealing District-Attorney Angier's corn. "Git a gun and shoot 'em," was the preacher's advice. Johnson got a gun, and the preacher was the first person shot. Montgomery had a sack filled with roasting ears, and was leaving the field, when a load of lead slugs was sent after him. One slug struck him in the left breast and another in the hip.

In a recent interview Cardinal Manning took great delight in saying there was nothing in his whole episcopal career which gave so much consolation to his heart as the fact that there was not a single Catholic child in London, known to the clergy or anybody, who was not in a Catholic school. His eminence said he was urged to erect a cathedral, but the cathedral he wanted to see during his episcopal career was a cathedral built up of living stones, the souls of his congregation. He said he would leave to his successors if need be to erect a cathedral, but he would do his duty and hav all the children in his diocese instructed in the Catholic faith.

The wealth of the Catholic church in Australia is enormous, and the propaganda at Rome appears to be acting upon Canning's principle and really calling into existence a new world to recompense the church for its declining power in Europe. Within the last seven years churches, schools, colleges, seminaries, nunneries, sisterhoods, and monastic orders hav been founded or established in all the Australian colonies, and are many of them under the control of Frenchmen, Italians, and Englishmen of exceptional ability, who present a marked contrast to the illiteracy of the ordinary country priest. In addition, large sums of money hav been raised in Australia and granted by Rome for the purchase of land and the erection of buildings; and all this increase of power and improvement of organization has taken place while the other religious bodies are inactiv and declining in authority. Nowhere is it more difficult than in a young country to forecast the future; but it seems plain from the present indications that, unless some new and modifying influence asserts itself, the scene of the struggle between church and liberty will be changed from France to Australia.—Macmillan's Magazine.

Communications.

On the War Path.

When I become satisfied that any system of religion or government is subversiv of the largest liberty consistent with the rights of others, then I get on my war paint, plume myself with eagles' quills, whet my scalping-knife, brandish my tomahawk, sound the death rattle, and take the war path. Then I recognize no rules of warfare. I am as likely to strike below the belt as anywhere.

It is not very encouraging for the few to keep trying to keep grease on the world's axletrees while hundreds are trying to hold everything at a standstill. But there are many, including the clergy, whose natural position is at the brakes. Nothing givs them greater alarm than anything which looks like progress.

Nearly two thousand years ago a class of men got it into their heads that there was great danger of men knowing too much; so they organized themselvs into societies for the suppression of knowledge. They claimed that there was a happier land which we might inhabit in the future, if we were only sufficiently ignorant and miserable here.

There was a strange sort of being ushered into the world—part man, part God, and part Ghost—a sort of connecting link between the miraculous and the natural. Then there was another being, equally mysterious, known as the Evil One, the Prince of Darkness, Old Sooty, Splitfoot, Satan, Devil, who "wanders up and down through the earth seeking whom he may devour." He seems to be a connecting link between Christians and the human race.

The first is recognized as business manager in the "happy land," the other is chief caterer in the land flowing with brimstone lava, where he serves sinners with brimstone tarts. These two beings are at endless war with each other, yet the Christian has as much use for one as the other. And the Christian could no more play his game without these two rulers and these two countries than he could play the thimble-rig without the "little joker."

If you do just as the Christian tells you to, and pay the minister, after the perplexities of life are ended he will giv you a long vacation in the happy land, where this "God-Ghost," plus a little touch of the human, will make everything so lovely that you will fairly squeal with delight. But if you get a little "heady" and don't chip in to send the missionary to enlighten the heathen, and sometimes find use for a grain of common sense, then the other fellow and the other country are brought into requisition. After the Christian has tortured you and made this life as miserable as it is possible for him to do, he turns you over to this barb-tailed gentleman with hoofs and horns, who will drag you down to his brimstone country, where you will be worked up into smoke which "ascendeth up forever," and gnawed by a fiery worm which "dieth not."

Here is the system which has held the world in ignorance and slavery for two thousand years. Between heaven and hell and Christ and the devil the nature of man has been perverted and his natural ambition and independence crushed out. How the Christian came by a knowledge of these two countries which hav never been laid down in any system of geography, and which no explorer has ever been able to discover, and how he became so intimately acquainted with their respectiv rulers, has never been revealed to thinking men.

How the Christian has been able to find out so many things which nobody else knows, must be a conundrum to all. He knows there is such a place as heaven, and such a place as hell. If these places exist, they must be above the earth, or on the earth, or in the earth. Now, is it not about time for some Christian geologist, or geographer, or astronomer to giv us some clew to these localities or put away their lying pretenses?

Josh Billings said that it was better not to know so much than to know so many things which ain't so. If there is a heaven and hell, they must be somewhere. Can there be a place without a location?

If they are without location, do they exist?

If Liberals would insist on more accurate descriptions, and definitions more in keeping with the scientific spirit of the age, Christians would often be driven into uncomfortable corners.

In every hymn and sermon, in every prayer and exhortation, the word God is repeated. Is there a man in the world who has a definit idea of him? All-wise, all-powerful, he is the creator of untold millions of human beings, the most of whom are created only to excite his wrath and be roasted in hell.

> Broad is the road that leads to death,
> And thousands flock together there;
> While wisdom shows a narrow path,
> With here and there a traveler.

Of all the untold millions whom God has brought into existence to people the earth, only a few, called Christians, can ever reach the happy land. All who are not Christians, no matter how good, stand no chance anyway. If this is the economy of heaven, let it be applied only to that distant country. It is ill adapted to the children of earth. A half-drunken idiot could make a better arrangement.

The Christian sees his God in the rainbow, in every opening flower, in the rolling wave, in the meadow, in the rippling brook. If the Christian sees God so many times, then why won't he tell us how this great spontagligasticus looks?

Nothing is more common than to hear a Christian talk about hearing the voice of God. He hears him as often as he sees him. Then why can't he tell us what kind of a noise he makes?

I never heard the voice of God but once. When I was quite a small boy I heard a strange kind of noise in a barn. I asked an older boy what noise that was, and, with a knowing look, he said, "Boy, that's the voice of God." I looked into the barn and there stood a jackass. From that boy and Balaam I got all the positiv knowledge which I hav ever been able to obtain in regard to God.

But the Christian will tell you that finite knowledge cannot comprehend the infinit. Then why should we try to tender him homage. We might just as well ask him to take a gin sling or smoke a cigar as to pray to him, for we cannot tell whether our actions will please or displease him.

Last Sunday I worked in the garden. Longface said that was very displeasing to God. How did he find that out? How did he come by knowledge which it is impossible for me to obtain? If I displease God, why doesn't he tell me so? Then I will hav the information direct from headquarters. Why cannot God tell me what he likes and hates just as well as to tell a Christian? If he ever did talk to men, why did he not tell the Christian barbarians to stop whipping women and burning heretics? Men hav gone into the desert, and into the wilderness, and into mountains and caves, to fast and meditate and pray. If such conduct is pleasing to God, and secures a through ticket to the happy land, then he is pleased with some of the greatest cranks and lick-spittles that ever disgraced a mother. If heaven is filled with such lunatics, God is welcome to their company. I would prefer the other country even if it is a little sultry. In the name of this God men hav made the greatest fools of themselvs, and done some of the most diabolical deeds that history givs any account of. In the name of this being war has been declared, throats hav been cut, and thousands hav been enslaved, imprisoned, and tortured. Has this afforded God sufficient enjoyment to balance all the human suffering?

Does working in the garden on Sunday hurt God any worse than the perpetration of these inhuman acts, or than the hanging of a helpless woman whom addled-brained Christians thought was a witch? Whatever has been done in the name of God has oftener proved a curse than a blessing.

It takes close application and more study than most men bestow to fathom the depths of Christian absurdity. Most men believe that God possesses unlimited power because they hav been taught that from their youth. He can shoot the waters of the Niagra right up into the air just as well as hav them plunge down over the rocks.

But how many realize that according to their own showing Christians hav control of this power? If God answers prayer, which all Christians claim, is there anything to hinder Christians from not only controling but utilizing this power? At one dash the impossible is wiped out, because "with God all things are possible," and he answers prayer, and this places all the power which he possesses at the disposal of those who pray.

It is all foolishness to talk about the impossibility of navigating the air, or of perpetual motion, for the impossible becomes the possible.

This being had all the power there was, and yet he begot a son who had as much power as himself. This shows that two may each eat all of the same cake and hav the whole of the cake left. The father occupied all the space there was, still the son, as great as he, finds plenty of room. This is on the principle of the dog which drank a pailful of milk, and when put into the pail did not fill it up. Great is the mystery of godliness, sure enough.

I hav not made this subject appear more ridiculous than it really is. I hav only held it up in such a light that the Christian may see what a fool he makes of himself.

And such fool-froth is to be sent to the heathen at millions of expense every year. This is the doctrin which is going to bring the highest state of civilization, and enlighten the world, and bring peace and brotherly love among the sons of men.

How insignificant is the knowledge and power of man compared with that of this great God! Yet Christians are all the time telling him what to do, and constantly busy about something which they calculate will help him on. When will God cease to be the ward of the Christians and be able to transact his own business without their advice or help? It will be a happy day for the race when Christians find out that God does not need their help.

The idea of doing something for God is the soul of the Blair (blare) bill. Millions must hav their rights curtailed because a lot of moonstruck idiots are anxious to do something for God. If I am compelled to attend church, or to refrain from working on Sunday for fear of the trip-hammer of the law, will God feel any better?

The Christian says it grieves God when a man works on Sunday. If God is grieved, whose fault is it? Has he not had the sole management from the beginning? Could he not see the outcome of his own acts? Could he not make the cogs in his own machine match?

If Christians could get this world running to suit themselvs, no doubt God would be tickled, but would it not be a little hard on us poor bipeds?

The Christian puts an imaginary being in the skies, and then he tells the people what they must do to please him, and what they must refrain from doing for fear of making him mad. If anyone differs from him he tries to make it hot for the party so differing, not so much on his own account as on account of his poor helpless God.

We hav run the government a hundred years without any God in the Constitution, and Christians are sorely alarmed for fear God will get mad and storm round and make it unpleasant for us. He may desert us entirely and take sides with some church-taxed, priest-ridden nation like Spain or Mexico, and then what would resources, or numbers, or navies, or armies amount to? He would just put down his foot, and we would go up the spout.

If Christians succeed in getting the "Blare" bill passed, and get God into the Constitution and Christ recognized as the chief ruler, and hav the Bible read and prayers said and hymns sung in all the schools, won't God pronounce us a "hunkey" people, and hover over this nation, and spend all his time showering down blessings upon us!

Then in a little while we shall begin to regale God with chunks of mutton, and roast beef, and turtle doves, and billy goats, as in times of yore.

Then won't he be a spooney God to us, and won't our eagle scream and soar high, and won't we become a bully people, and wallop other nations, and smite 'em "hip and thigh" just for the fun of it? We may bring up our children in ignorance and run into all manner of debauchery, enslave the poor and raise "l" and repeat; if we can only get God on our side he will preserve us and make us a mighty people. Selah! bah! rats! chestnuts! or language to that effect.

They must hav had God on their side in New England when they compelled the people to attend church and pay the minister, and when they taxed everything for God's sake. If that did not please him I don't know what would. They certainly were a God-fearing people, and ought to hav been the happiest community in the world. But the more they did to please God the worse it proved for the people. They whipped women, hanged witches, and showed their loving kindness to the Quakers. It is a fact, never to be forgotten, the more devoted to the savior or God the people hav been the more like devils they hav acted.

If "Blare" succeeds in driving his wedge home other anticipated changes will follow, and we shall soon get back to a flat earth. Then such Christian cranks as Cook and Comstock, Talmage and the two Sams, will dictate all the laws, and we shall be compelled to attend church and sing, "Praise God From Whom All Blessings Flow." Then God will begin to enjoy himself. He will take down his meerschaum and lie back in his big chair, and puff away as happy as though he was playing a game of "seven up," with a hand of four aces.

In the early days of Christianity the rich were made to divide with the poor. Now there is no division at all. The rich take all the poor produce, and don't care enough about the salvation of their souls to allow them to sit in the same pew. If Christ should appear as in times of old riding on an ass, the first rich Christian he met would probably propound the following conundrum: "Which is which?"

Harrison is a great man because he is a great Christian; how could he be great if he wasn't. He proposes to run the government on a Christian basis. His chief fuglemen are the ones who furnish the most boodle. Wanamaker employs Christian women at wages so low that they are compelled to liv on thin soup furnished in vast quantities by him in order to hav it come cheap enough so that their living does not overbalance their wages.

But with their thin soup "Blare" proposes to giv them plenty of cheap religion and Sunday rest. It beats all how the sympathy of these Christians does run. No matter whether poor women hav enough to eat or not, they must not work on Sunday; that would grieve God. Thousands all over the country are working at starvation wages, but God doesn't care so much about that as he does about keeping folks from working on Sunday.

Stop the mails, tie up the boats, shut up the telegraph offices, squelch the Sunday papers, bring everything to a deadlock, no matter how much the people are inconvenienced, if we can only keep God good-natured. But he is so equivocal that nobody, with any degree of safety, can predict how it will all turn out.

We hav an old man in our village who is blind. He has been in the service of God many years, and his wife has been in the habit of reading to him and keeping him in good cheer, but recently she died. And now he says he "is left alone in the dark." One would hardly think that God would go back on his own in that way. JOHN PECK.

Our London Letter.

The senior puisne judge of the supreme court of New South Wales, in overruling the conviction of Mr. Collins by a magistrate for publishing Mrs. Besant's "Law of Population," must hav given a sore blow to the religious bigots of the colony. Although the work has nothing to do with Freethought itself, yet, like most movements for the amelioration of misery, it has been strongly supported by many Freethinkers, and perhaps chiefly for that reason has been so greatly opposed by the religious community. At the same time certain of the "Agnostic party are as bitter against what is known as "Malthusianism" as any religionist, but this I can not help thinking is as much through personal feeling as anything. I cannot understand how any reflecting individual can believe it a good thing to hav indiscriminate propagation of the human species. The proposed alternativ of late marriage is quite out of the question, and would only mean increased prostitution. If early marriage and late parentage in accordance with means were the general rule, there would in all probability be a serious diminution of sexual crime. In the present unreasoning state of society possibly there is less harm done to the community by prostitution than by begetting an unlimited supply of children, for whom no sustenance is or can be supplied. But we are so very modest that the subject is far too indelicate to mention, and so to save our blushes we go on in the old reckless way, supplying mouths for which no God ever supplies the food.

The Sabbatarian shareholders of the Brighton railway at the last meeting pretended they were greatly shocked at the company for running excursion trains on Sunday, but when it was clearly demonstrated that these trains made a very appreciable difference in the dividend, the opposition grew fainter and fainter, till it quite evaporated. A question of one per cent would speedily alter the views of the most godly man who ever snuffled psalms through his nose.

The clergy are most incorrigible beggars, quite equal to German princes. A canon at a recent convention stated that many curates were half starved, and called upon the laity to make their positions a little more comfortable. He did not go on to say that the sum of £466,000 per annum is divided amongst two hundred and sixty "higher" clergy, nor did he draw attention to the fact that eleven of these gentry left at their deaths personal estate alone of over one million pounds sterling. Such facts as these surely should be sufficient to open the eyes of the dupes who reverence these thieves so ostentatiously and devoutly, but the fool crop is always growing, and it will take much common-sense Freethought to eradicate the weed.

I hav just seen a report of a lecture given by a missionary to the Jews at Jerusalem. The lecturer did not giv much definit information as to the future of Palestine. He said that the Jews may or may not all return to the promised land, it depended a good deal on how you read the "prophecies;" it was also a question whether or not they would be converted before or after the return, if that ever came to pass; several other open questions were descanted upon, and the proceedings ended with a collection, as usual.

A well-dressed man of thirty-four years of age who gave the name of Jesus Christ was recently charged at the Mansion House for damaging the property of the Salvation Army by smashing two panes of glass, value, £10. Booth, who says he believes in the original J. C., and is looking for the second coming of the same party, does not appear to hav examined the credentials of the party he prosecuted, and so I fear he may run a fearful risk of eternal damnation, which will be a pity. It is not surprising that the second coming is indefinitly postponed, as the comer would be promptly shut up in a lunatic asylum by the elect. Whenever he does come, it will be best for him to keep away from his friends.

The vicar of Hoo has found himself brought into a court of law for refusing the sacrament to a female parishioner who has committed the terrible sin of sometimes attending a Wesleyan chapel. What a storm in a teapot! Fancy spending a lot of money in law charges to compel a man to giv you a sip of indifferent wine, when you could lay down a good cellar of genuin stuff with the amount.

It seems there is a great call for new bishops, but the upper house of convocation won't manufacture any unless they are guaranteed an income of £3,500 each, and when it was suggested that possibly £2,000 would be a sufficient bait, their lordships were so shocked at the suggestion that it was with great difficulty they were prevented from excommunicating the blasphemous wretch who dared to make such a proposition. J. D.

The Convention at Portland, Ore.

Never before has there been such practical unity among the churches. The advance of Freethought has compelled them to lay aside sectarian quarrels and devote their best efforts to forging heavier chains of superstition and bigotry with which to shackle human progress.

The strength of orthodoxy is in its well-matured methods of carrying out its schemes, through its perfect organization.

The weakness of Liberalism is betrayed in its lack of unity in any plan of work. It necessarily fails to promote "its aims and objects," and need expect only comparativ failure until it attains perfect organization.

What progress would the National Reform Association or the Sabbath Union make, only for their unity of action rendered persistent and efficient by thorough organization?

True it is that "the American government is in no sense founded on the Christian religion;" that our Constitution recognizes no other power than that of persuasion for enforcing religious observances; that the conscience of the minority is no less sacred than that of the majority; that the liberty of conscience is a right of every citizen, and that, while he respects the rights of others, he should not be amenable to any tribunal for his conclusions.

Yet Christians hav negatived these constitutional rights and privileges, and curtailed to the utmost of their power all religious liberty.

The blasphemy laws of New Jersey, that doom a man to state prison for expressing his honest thought, are yet unrepealed.

Sunday laws in nearly all the states are enforced by fine and imprisonment.

The lukewarm, those who hav never suffered, may pooh-pooh, and deny that there is any great danger, but the close observer realizes the peril with which our liberties are menaced. One becomes much more sensitiv to the danger from union of church and state after being ensnared in the meshes of the law, and suffering from religious persecution.

So long as the different denominations lived out the Bible teaching, and, like the mantis religiosa, whenever they came together fought till, cannibal-like, the stronger would eat off the weaker one's head, we were measurably safe. But now they hav called a halt and united in a struggle for existence, and to defeat reason, right, and truth, and more completely enslave the people.

Catholics and Protestants are united in their efforts and determination to destroy our public schools, the true bulwarks of American independence.

They are united to secure exemption from taxation of all church property, thus compelling people to support churches and dogmas which they are bitterly opposed to and regard as inimical to the best interests of humanity.

They are united in endeavoring to enforce rigid Sunday laws.

The Christian Statesman, the organ of the God-in-the-Constitution party, in its issue of Dec. 11, 1884, says:

> Whenever the Roman Catholics are willing to coöperate in resisting the progress of political Atheism, we will gladly join hands with them.

The pastoral letter of the bishops of the Episcopal church of America, dated Chicago, Ill., Oct. 1886, says:

> With heartfelt thanks to almighty God, your bishops recognize an increasing desire among Christian people for that unity for which our Lord prayed. . . . For this unity the church is called upon to stand with open arms and earnest pleading, ready to yield to the utmost in any matter of human ordering, or any choice of human will, so that they may join heart to heart with all who desire to stand upon the unchangeable faith expressed in the creed of Nicea, the two divine sacraments, and the open Bible.

And when, in December, 1888, the demand for a national Sunday law reached the point at which it was supported by six million petitioners, Cardinal Gibbons came out with a letter to Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, the leader of the Protestant side, heartily indorsing the national Sunday bill, and gladly adding his name to the number of petitioners. And on the strength of the cardinal's letter the Rev. Mr. Crafts and the Women's Christian Temperance Union added seven million and three hundred thousand Catholics to the six million Protestants already obtained.

At the convention of the National Reform Association held at Pittsburgh, Pa., the leaders publicly declared that the enforcement of Sunday observance in the big cities was only the entering wedge; the United States was part of Christ's kingdom, and they were Christ's representativs, and the only proper persons to make laws to govern the people. And this is in strict harmony with the pastoral letter above referred to; it says:

> The gospel has not lost its power. The son of God is riding forth conquering, and to conquer. He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet. And to this task set before us, as a part of the church of Jesus Christ, to extend his reign on this fair land, to make the American republic submissiv to his will, we address ourselvs hopefully. This great work is laid upon the church by her Lord.

In the Christian Statesman, May 25, 1885, in a report of a National Reform convention, held at York, Neb., is this:

> We might add in all justice, if the opponents of the Bible do not like our government and its Christian features, let them go to some wild, desolate land, and, in the name of the devil and for the sake of the devil, subdue it and set up a government of their own on Infidel and Atheistic ideas, and then, if they can stand it, stay there till they die.

This same God-in-the-Constitution party has recently manifested its power in each of the four constitutional conventions.

In Olympia, Wash., despite an actual majority of the delegation being really opposed, the influence and strength of their organization secured them a victory, and the insertion of "a supreme ruler of the universe" in the constitution.

They are well organized, and so can do effectiv work in promoting union of church and state.

The Rev. Mr. Crafts (most aptly named) has aroused the ministers of Portland, Ore., to energetic endeavor to enforce rigid Sunday observance. A crusade against bakers, milkmen, barbers, druggists, and saloons is inaugurated, and it is resolved to hold a grand convention of the Sabbath Union at Portland in October.

These Christians are not seeking protection; they are already protected most fully, no one has any desire to hinder their keeping Sunday or any other day as religiously as they please.

It is not liberty for themselvs they are working for, but power to curtail the liberty of others. And their open avowals prove that if they can ever obtain the power they are now so zealously and persistently striving for, this land will cease to be the land of the free.

Intolerance and persecution are inseparable from the success of such movements as those of this National Reform Association, the Sabbath Union, Women's Christian Temperance Union, and Young Men's Christian Association.

Ignorance and fanaticism rule, because intelligence is inert.

The same sophisms and lamb-like declarations were made when they secured passage of the law in Arkansas, enforcing on all strict observance of Sunday. The penalty was only a small fine. Yes, but the costs made up sufficient to keep quite a number of devout Christian Bible believers in jail for months. They dragged a man from his sick young wife and baby, and only released him in time to return home as his neighbors were bearing the dead bodies of his wife and child to their graves.

Alas! so many Liberals are lukewarm and indifferent. Reader, do you desire to wait till the crushing power of the remorseless anaconda shall enfold you in its deadly, loathsome coils? Then it will be too late.

The great convention of the Sabbath Union, at Portland, Ore., should be antagonized by a larger and more influential convention of Liberals.

The interests of the Liberals of both Oregon and Washington will be greatly promoted by forming a joint state Union at Portland in October. The majority are of this opinion. The convention is appointed. We must make it a grand success.

Every Liberal man, woman, and child in Oregon and Washington is personally interested. Success means a mighty impetus to our cause—the removal of prejudice, resulting from ignorance of our "aims and objects." Investigation by hundreds of intelligent, honest hearts of the reasons of their faith and hope will follow, and consequently we shall hav large accessions to our ranks, renewing the courage and zeal of our workers, awakening from apathy the indolent, and imparting confidence to and strengthening the backbone of the weakly ones.

Failure would be disastrous throughout, not alone the two states, but the whole Northwest.

To insure success, talk up the convention among the friends in your vicinity; secure insertion of notices in regard to the preparations for the convention in your local newspapers.

Send at once your contribution to the expenses. Send by draft, money order, or registered letter. Address C. Beal, president Oregon Secular Union, Portland, Ore. And then resolve you will yourself attend, and use all your influence to induce others to do so.

It will be a just source of pride to us and to our children in years to come that we had the honor of contributing to and participating in the great Portland convention in the fall of 1889—at the forming of the joint state Union of Oregon and Washington—the largest and most important gathering of Liberals, up to that time, ever held in the United States.

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our ociety was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

The Prize Manual Assured.

I am proud to be able to announce that the full sum of $1,000, as a premium for the best paper on "how to teach morality in Girard College and in the public schools without teaching religious dogma," has been paid into my hands, and is now in bank, in trust for the object contemplated. The offer of this prize, with full conditions, will be made public, with the names of the donors, about September 1st, and sooner if practicable. Now I wish that a few others of our friends would send me, at once, about $500 to pay the expenses of printing circulars, and for advertising, and for the services of a stenographer and typewriter, to get the matter before the world, at least before American, English, and French writers and educators. I hav already many letters of inquiry from persons who wish to compete for this prize, not only for the sake of the money, but for their love of the cause. The correspondence growing out of this project must be very voluminous. Friends, please send me $500 more, in such sums as you think proper, and you shall be numbered with the elect, whose names are sure to go down to posterity as promoters of this great object! R. B. WESTBROOK,
President American Secular Union.

The Funeral of Horace Seaver.

"The world is my country, and to do good is my religion." These simple words which form part of an inscription cut in stone over the arched entrance to Paine Memorial Hall, must hav had a profound significance for those who last Sunday gathered in that building to do honor to dead Horace Seaver. In the forenoon people began to assemble in the street. By noon there were large numbers, and at 2, the hour for the services to begin, several thousand people were gathered. It was with great difficulty that Colonel Ingersoll and the few with him could make their way into the building. The police had extreme trouble in holding back the crowd that pressed inward at every door. Many offered $5 and $10 for admittance. But the hall, large though it is, was fully occupied by the friends of the deceased who had received printed invitations. Presently the crowd outside took advantage of the temporary absence of one of the doorkeepers, and several hundred forced themselvs in. They packed the aisles and every available point. Colonel Ingersoll, who was then speaking, was compelled to pause ten or fifteen minutes till quiet could be restored.

The exercises had been opened by the singing, by an excellent quartet of male voices, of the following selection from the "Cosmian Hymn Book:"

Lay me low, my work is done;
I am weary, lay me low;
Where the wild-flowers woo the sun,
Where the balmy breezes blow;
Where he butterfly takes wing,
Where the aspens drooping grow;
Where the young birds chirp and sing,
I am weary, let me go.

I hav striven hard and long
In the world's unequal fight,
Always to resist the wrong,
Always to maintain the right;
Always with a stubborn heart
Taking, giving blow for blow;
Brothers, I hav played my part—
I am weary, let me go.

Shield and buckler, hang them up,
Drape the standard on the wall;
I hav drained the mortal cup
To the finish, dregs and all.
When my work is done, 'tis best
To let all my troubles go;
I am weary, let me rest—
I am weary, lay me low.

Colonel Ingersoll then pronounced the following noble eulogy:

Horace Seaver was a pioneer, a torch-bearer, a toiler in that great field we call the world—a worker for his fellow-men. At the end of his task he has fallen asleep, and we are met to tell the story of his long and useful life—to pay our tribute to his work and worth.

He was one who saw the dawn while others lived in night. He kept his face towards the "purpling east," and watched the coming of the blessed day.

He always sought for light. His object was to know—to find a reason for his faith—a fact on which to build.

In superstition's sands he sought the gems of truth; in superstition's night he looked for stars.

Born in New England—reared amidst the cruel superstitions of his age and time, he had the manhood and the courage to investigate, and he had the goodness and the courage to tell his honest thoughts.

He was always kind, and sought to win the confidence of men by sympathy and love. There was no taint or touch of malice in his blood. To him his fellows did not seem depraved—they were not wholly bad—there was within the heart of each the seeds of good. He knew that back of every thought and act were forces uncontrolled. He wisely said: "Circumstances furnish the seeds of good and evil, and man is but the soil in which they grow." He fought the creed, and loved the man. He pitied those who feared and shuddered at the thought of death—who dwelt in darkness and in dread.

The religion of his day filled his heart with horror.

He was kind, compassionate, and tender, and could not fall upon his knees before a cruel and revengeful God—he could not bow to one who slew with famine, sword, and fire—to one pitiless as pestilence, relentless as the lightning stroke. Jehovah had no attribute that he could love.

He attacked the creed of New England—a creed that had within it the ferocity of Knox, the malice of Calvin, the cruelty of Jonathan Edwards—a religion that had a monster for a God—a religion whose dogmas would have shocked cannibals feasting upon babes.

Horace Seaver followed the light of his brain—the impulse of his heart.

He was attacked, but he answered the insulter with a smile; and even he who coined malignant lies was treated as a friend misled. He did not ask God to forgive his enemies—he forgave them himself.

He was sincere. Sincerity is the true and perfect mirror of the mind. It reflects the honest thought. It is the foundation of character, and without it there is no moral grandeur.

Sacred are the lips from which has issued only truth. Over all wealth, above all station, above the noble, the robed and the crowned, rises the sincere man.

Happy is the man who neither paints nor patches, veils nor veneers! Blessed is he who wears no mask!

The man who lies before us wrapped in perfect peace, practiced no art to hide or half conceal his thought. He did not write or speak the double words that might be useful in retreat.

He gave a truthful transcript of his mind, and sought to make his meaning clear as light.

To use his own words, he had "the courage which impels a man to do his duty, to hold fast his integrity, to maintain a conscience void of offense, at every hazard and at every sacrifice, in defiance of the world."

He lived to his ideal. He sought the approbation of himself. He did not build his character upon the opinions of others, and it was out of the very depths of his nature that he asked this profound question:

"What is there in other men that makes us desire their approbation, and fear their censure more than our own?"

Horace Seaver was a good and loyal citizen of the mental republic—a believer in intellectual hospitality, one who knew that bigotry is born of ignorance and fear—the provincialisms of the brain. He did not belong to the tribe, or to the nation, but to the human race. His sympathy was wide as want and, like the sky, bent above the suffering world.

This man had that superb thing which we call moral courage—courage in its highest form. He knew that his thoughts were not the thoughts of others—that he was with the few, and that where one would take his side, thousands would be his eager foes. He knew that wealth would scorn and cultured ignorance deride, and that all believers in the creeds, buttressed by law and custom, would hurl the missiles of revenge and hate. He knew that lies, like snakes, would fill the pathway of his life—and yet he told his honest thought—told it without hatred and without contempt—told it as it really was. And so, through all his days, his heart was sound and stainless to the core.

When he enlisted in the army whose banner is light, the honest investigator was looked upon as lost and curst, and even Christian criminals held him in contempt. The believing embezzler, the orthodox wife-beater, even the murderer, lifted his bloody hands and thanked God that on his soul there was no stain of unbelief.

In nearly every state of our republic, the man who denied the absurdities and impossibilities lying at the foundation of what is called orthodox religion, was denied his civil rights. He was not canopied by the ægis of the law. He stood beyond the reach of sympathy. He was not allowed to testify against the invader of his home, the seeker for his life—his lips were closed. He was declared dishonorable, because he was honest. His unbelief made him a social leper, a pariah, an outcast. He was the victim of religious hate and scorn. Arrayed against him were all the prejudices and all the forces and hypocrisies of society. All mistakes and lies were his enemies. Even the theist was denounced as a disturber of the peace although he told his thoughts in kind and candid words. He was called a blasphemer, because he sought to rescue the reputation of his God from the slanders of orthodox priests.

Such was the bigotry of the time, that natural love was lost. The unbelieving son was hated by his pious sire, and even the mother's heart was by her creed turned into stone.

Horace Seaver pursued his way. He worked and wrought as best he could, in solitude and want. He knew the day would come. He lived to be rewarded for his toil—to see most of the laws repealed that had made outcasts of the noblest, the wisest, and the best. He lived to see the foremost preachers of the world attack the sacred creeds. He lived to see the sciences released from superstition's clutch. He lived to see the orthodox theologian take his place with the professor of the black art, the fortune-teller, and the astrologer. He lived to see the best and greatest of the world accept his thought—to see the theologians displaced by the great and true priests of Nature—by Humboldt and Darwin, by Huxley and Haëckel.

Within the narrow compass of his life the world was changed. The railway, the steamship, and the telegraph made all nations neighbors. Countless inventions have made the luxuries of the past the necessities of to-day. Life has been enriched, and man ennobled. The geologist has read the records of frost and flame, of wind and wave—the astronomer has told the story of the stars—the biologist has sought the germ of life, and in every department of knowledge, the torch of science sheds its sacred light.

The ancient creeds have grown absurd. The miracles are small and mean. The inspired book is filled with fables told to please a childish world, and the dogma of eternal pain now shocks the heart and brain.

He lived to see a monument unveiled to Bruno in the city of Rome—to Giordano Bruno—that great man who two hundred and eighty-nine years ago suffered death for having proclaimed the truths that since have filled the world with joy. He lived to see the victim of the church a victor—lived to see his memory honored by a nation freed from papal chains.

He worked knowing what the end must be—expecting little while he lived—but he knew that every fact in the wide universe was on his side. He knew that truth can wait, and so he worked, patient as eternity.

He had the brain of a philosopher and the heart of a child.

Horace Seaver was a man of common sense.

By that, I mean, one who knows the law of average. He denied the bible, not on account of what has been discovered in astronomy, or the length of time it took to form the delta of the Nile—but he compared the things he found with what he knew.

He knew that antiquity added nothing to probability—that lapse of time can never take the place of cause, and that the dust can never gather thick enough upon mistakes to make them equal with the truth.

He knew that the old, by no possibility, could have been more wonderful than the new, and that the present is a perpetual torch by which we know the past.

To him, all miracles were mistakes, whose parents were cunning and credulity. He knew that miracles were not, because they are not.

He believed in the sublime, unbroken, and eternal march of causes and effects—denying the chaos of chance and the caprice of power.

He tested the past by the now, and judged of all the men and races of the world by those he knew.

He believed in the religion of free thought and good deed—of character, of sincerity, of honest endeavor, of cheerful help—and above all, in the religion of love and liberty—in a religion for every day—for the world in which we live—for the present: the religion of roof and raiment, of food, of intelligence, of intellectual hospitality—the religion that gives health and happiness, freedom and content—in the religion of work, and in the ceremonies of honest labor.

He lived for this world; if there be another, he will live for that.

He did what he could for the destruction of fear—the destruction of the imaginary monster who rewards the few in heaven—the monster who tortures the many in perdition.

He was the friend of all the world, and sought to civilize the human race.

For more than fifty years he labored to free the bodies and the souls of men—and many thousands have read his words with joy. He sought the suffering and oppressed. He sat by those in pain—and his hand was laid in pity on the brow of death.

He asked only to be treated as he treated others. He asked for only what he earned, and he had the manhood to cheerfully accept the consequences of his actions. He expected no reward for the goodness of another.

But he has lived his life. We should shed no tears except the tears of gratitude. We should rejoice that he lived so long.

In Nature's course, his time had come. The four seasons were complete in him. The Spring could never come again. The measure of his years was full.

When the day is done—when the work of a life is finished—when the gold of evening meets the dusk of night, beneath the silent stars the tired laborer should fall asleep. To outlive usefulness is a double death.

> "Let me not live after my flame lacks oil,
> To be the snuff of younger spirits."

When the old oak is visited in vain by Spring—when light and rain no longer thrill—it is not well to stand leafless, desolate, and alone—it is better far to fall where Nature softly covers all with woven moss and creeping vine.

How little, after all, we know of what is ill or well! How little of this wondrous stream of cataracts and pools—this stream of life, that rises in a world unknown, and flows to that mysterious sea whose shore the foot of one who comes hath never pressed! How little of this life we know—this struggling ray of light 'twixt gloom and gloom—this strip of land, by verdure clad, between the unknown wastes—this throbbing moment filled with love and pain—this dream that lies between the shadowy shores of sleep and death!

We stand upon this verge of crumbling time. We love, we hope, we disappear. Again we mingle with the dust, and the "knot intrinsicate" forever falls apart.

But this we know: A noble life enriches all the world.

Horace Seaver lived for others. He accepted toil and hope deferred. Poverty was his portion. Like Socrates, he did not seek to adorn his body, but rather his soul with the jewels of charity, modesty, courage, and above all, with a love of liberty.

Farewell, O brave and modest man!

Your lips, between which truth burst into blossom, are forever closed. Your loving heart has ceased to beat. Your busy brain is still, and from your hand has dropped the sacred torch.

Your noble, self-denying life has honored us, and we will honor you!

You were my friend, and I was yours. Above your silent clay I pay this tribute to your worth.

Farewell!

This august address was delivered by the colonel in his usual unapproachable manner. During its last part he turned and faced the coffin, seeming to address Mr. Seaver personally as much as the audience. The hearers will never forget the impression made by seeing this intellectual giant, subdued with grief, moved and filled by his sorrows and his sympathies and the deep and awful sense of fate, pouring forth the contents of his sincere, truthful heart by the side of his loved old friend. They repeatedly answered sentiments that struck into their hearts with prolonged yet low applause.

The quartet next sang another fitting Freethought hymn:

I am wand'ring down life's shady path,
I am slowly, slowly wand'ring down;
I am wand'ring down life's rugged path,
I am slowly wand'ring down.

REFRAIN.—
I am wand'ring down, I am wand'ring down,
Slowly, slowly I am wand'ring down,
I am wand'ring down, I am wand'ring down,
Slowly wand'ring down.

I shall rest in yon sweet valley soon,
There to sleep, to sleep my toil away;
I shall rest in yon low valley soon,
Rest until the dawning day.

REF.—
I am wand'ring down, I am wand'ring down,
Slowly, slowly I am wand'ring down,
I am wand'ring down, I am wand'ring down,
Slowly wand'ring down.

Laid, side by side, with those I love,
How calm, how calm that rest shall be;
Laid, side by side, with those I love,
How sweet that rest to me.

REF.—
I am wand'ring down, I am wandr'ing down,
Slowly, slowly wand'ring down,
I am wand'ring down, I am wand'ring down,
Slowly wand'ring down.

Then the remains were conveyed to the hearse. The pall-bearers were James Parton, Wyzeman Marshall, Geo. N. Hill, Ernest Mendum, John O'Malley, and C. P. Somerby.

A list of those who had been prominent in the audience comprised J. P. Mendum, business partner of Mr. Seaver, and his family; James Parton, of Newburyport, the biographer; Wyzeman Marshall; Louis Prang; Dr. R. C. Flower; Dr. W. Simmonton Brown, of Stoneham; Jonathan Nichols, of Wakefield; Judge Robinson, of Pawtucket, R. I.; Miss Lucy Colman; William D. Rockwood, of South Boston; Dr. Speare; J. Day, of the Banner of Light; Miss S. H. Wixon, of Fall River; Mr. Tucker, superintendent of public buildings; Miss Lucette Webster; Mrs. Heath; Dr. H. G. Newton; Mrs. W. S. Butler; John Davies; Dr. Dillingham, Jr.; Henry Appleton, of Providence; L. K. Washburn, of Revere; Miss A. P. Joyce, of Warnerville; Geo. B. Jones; Geo. M. Hill and Carl Heintzen, of Boston; Chas. P. Somerby, of THE TRUTH SEEKER, New York; Ex-Senator Joyner, of Great Barrington, and Ex-Senator Messenger, of Plymouth.

The floral contributions had been profuse and elaborate. An open book, representing a volume of the Investigator, was the beautiful gift of Misses Lydia, Lottie, Lizzie, and Hattie Mendum. Messrs. Colby and Rich, of the Banner of Light, sent a large pillow of ivy; the Children's Progressiv Lyceum, a pillow inscribed, "At Rest;" George N. Hill, a bouquet; B. Matthews, a wreath; J. P. Mendum, a torch on which was wrought, "Gone Before." German friends sent a very fine wreath; Walter S. Verity passed in a floral mound; Miss A. P. Joyce, a rich wreath of everlastings; the Ingersoll Secular Society sent a similar design; John A. O'Malley, a large basket. These and many other fragrant tributes were carefully arranged by F. B. Woodbury in the hall, and finally placed on the grave. The compositors on the Investigator sent a magnificent floral anchor.

The burial was at Forest Hills, a beautiful place. The grave was under a maple-tree. Friends gathered with uncovered heads, and the casket was lowered into the grave amid a deep silence. Colonel Ingersoll stood beneath a young maple-tree looking with sorrowful interest at the resting-place of his friend. Those present evidently expected a few words, but a feeling "Good-bye" was all that could be heard. The colonel was too deeply affected to say more, and as the workmen leveled off the grave and loving hands laid the flowers upon it, he turned silently and sadly away.

Giovanni Morosini was recently asked by a Saratoga clergyman if Jay Gould "keeps the Sabbath." "Of course he does," answered Morosini. "He keeps anything he lays his hands on."

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON will giv a course of five lectures in Hay Springs, Neb., September 8th, 9th, 10th, 11th, 12th. He will visit Kansas after completing Nebraska engagements. Address at Coryell, Col.

WE take pleasure in stating, on the authority of Secretary Marius Heighton, that the Kent Secular Union will hold a series of mass-meetings, beginning Saturday evening, August 31st, in Kent's Hall, and continuing over Sunday, September 1st, in Kent's Grove as a basket picnic, and ending Sunday evening, September 1st, in Kent's Hall. Speaking at 10 A.M. and 2 P.M. at the Grove meetings. The veteran worker, Hon. A. B. Bradford, will be present with others to help J. H. Burnham entertain the multitude. Good music in attendance. Everybody invited regardless of race or previous condition of servitude to kingcraft or priestcraft.

WE solicit all of our readers in the Northwest who can attend the convention of the Oregon state Secular Union to do so. It will be held at Portland, Ore., at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, October 12th, 13th, and 14th. It is aimed to hav the convention participated in not by Oregon Freethinkers alone, but by those of Washington also, and even, if possible, by those of all the new states. The object is to secure the total separation of church and state. Liberal orators and workers of every kind will be there. Surely the noble efforts just put forth by many Freethought veterans in the new states will induce in all a desire to meet and see those workers for us, and grasp their hands. Contributions, and communications of all kinds, will be received by the board of directors, C. Beal, A. F. Neunert, J. K. Sears, Lee Laughlin, L. Ames.

The Human Intellect.

From the Washington Post.

We ought to be perfectly happy that we liv in this glorious age of scientific thought. We believe there never was another age in which the astronomer of Harvard Observatory could propound the following problem and receive so many perfectly reasonable answers to it: "Suppose," said he, "that three snakes, each two feet in length, should touch each other by the tip of the tail, thus making a circle six feet in circumference. Suppose that each snake should begin to swallow the one in front of him. In what way would the resultant figure, after each snake had swallowed the one in front of him, differ from the original circle?" The answers hav been many and various, some of them, we are informed, "entering the consideration of the fourth dimension of space," because any one of the snakes would hav followed the two in front of him and yet hav been swallowed by the two back of him, and, therefore, would be both inside and outside of his two fellows. The man who livs in an age when men can tackle and grasp and make so clear to others an idea of this sort has no business to be going about talking of the good old times, or looking hopefully forward to anything more millenniumish.

A Gospel for the Century.

From the New York Herald.

In the Nineteenth Century there is a passionate protest by Father Barry against the indisposition of churchmen generally to boldly deal with the question of capital and labor, and kindred social problems. Here is a picture from his pen:

> Religion, secluded the while in her cathedral stalls, may chant lovely anthems and wear copes of broidered gold. But where is the multitude that should throng nave and aisles? Outside, I say, brawling, drinking, tearing their bread from one another, working, with despair in their hearts the while, as many hours of the day and night as they can toil and liv.

Father Barry takes a gloomy view of things and loudly calls for a gospel that will meet the wants of the century. "I am convinced," he says, "that society must undergo a transformation or perish."

Possibly the reverend essayist slightly exaggerates the situation. At the same time it is undoubtedly true that the alienation of a great mass of humanity from the churches has some immediate relation to socio-industrial complications. The leading preachers of this country are beginning to recognize that fact, as the Herald's sermon reports show every Sunday morning.

The Absurdity of Prayer.

From the Twentieth Century.

Some one, who signs himself or herself "an Episcopalian," sent Governor Lee, of Virginia, a postal card, on which the following was written:

> I hope Governor Lee will not consider it an intrusion if, in view of the terrible rains which hav deluged the whole country, and especially our own city, I suggest to him that he request the pastors of our various churches to present earnest prayers to our heavenly father to look upon us in mercy and restrain these rains. Sunday is near at hand and will be a fit time for such a petition.

A belief in a heavenly father is a very beautiful belief, sentimentally, but real reverence should giv him credit for knowing when to hav it rain and when to hav it stop. Is it possible that it is necessary that he should be instructed in his duty in this matter?

Hurrah for Pefley.

From the Concordia, Kan., Blade.

Idaho has one man possessed of more than ordinary good sense. His name is Pefley. He refused to sign the new constitution because it contained the words "almighty God." Just why a constitution framed after the federal Constitution is not good enough for a state would puzzle anyone but a crank on religion.

Communications.

Road to Ruin.

"The multiplying villainies of nature do swarm upon us," and they swarm especially by legislation. The whole system of our lawmaking is a ridiculous blunder. Is governing anything more or less than business? and very important business, too. Now, would any business firm, any railway corporation, intrust all its rule and regulation making, including the fixing of their own salaries, to their employees exclusivly, with no censorship, no yea or nay of their own to overrule? And yet "we the people," in this business of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, intrust to our accidental employees, from aldermen of towns up to United States Senators, the whole thing. No wonder if, as years go by, all the profits of our concern are swamped in taxes. It could not be otherwise, and there can be but one end to it, utter ruin. And the way things are mismanaged is a caution, or ought to be if we were not asleep.

Look at Congress. When our population was just one-third what it now is, it cost just $4,000,000 per year to rule us. The civil list is just the ordinary cost of running the government. It comes under the heading "Civil and Miscellaneous." There is no excuse for its costing more than the same sum per capita that it did in 1840. Yet to-day it costs some $80,000,000 instead of $15,000,000, as would be reasonable. It never cost even $30,000,000 during the war, yet after 1865 it sprang right up into $40,000,000, and from that to $60,000,000 in four or five years. It has not anything to do with debt, interest, war, army or navy, or pensions or bounty. It is the bare, ordinary cost of governing. One thing shows how the rats will make off with the cheese. Congress about seventy years ago made a law to giv to each member two or three hundred dollars for contingent expenses yearly. At that time a Congressman's pay was very small and it cost a great deal to travel. Well, that has grown up to be several thousand dollars per head, while the salaries hav been more than quadrupled. It ought to do us some good to look back on these things.

One of the oddest things is our way of appointing committees to investigate the conditions of asylums, and everything that needs investigating. Committee is appointed; it goes to visit the place on a day fixed; it is received with all honor, and everything is done to blindfold and fuddle the inspectors. Committee reports: "We visited the asylum—agreeably, etc. We were received with all respect by the very excellent Mr. Grinder, who has it in charge. We were conducted throughout the premises. We dined on the same victuals that are given to the inmates. We examined everything. We hav no language to express our admiration," etc. The same old stereotyped words; the same old ways. And often this method has been covering crimes that should make hell tremble. The women say men are cowards and hav no independence. It would seem so, for it has happened that a committee of women following a committee of men hav made wonderful exposures. But anyone can see how foolish and inefficient are all such methods. Committees for inspecting institutions where abuses are probable should report secretly, each member for himself. And their visits should be made at any time, unexpectedly, and their reports returned to a tribunal sworn to secrecy as to the names of reporters. Any way is better than the usual one.

How little do the people, these who alone are properly interested in it, know about the way laws are made! Last winter the writer was present during the session of a state legislature. Often for days bills were proposed and passed to a third reading faster than the shorthand writers could get down their titles. In a few days nearly a thousand bills were on file, and this too for a state whose population does not exceed that of some inconsiderable towns. Jobbery and fraud were hidden in all the legislation proposed, and the appropriations were enormous for such a population. We all know that some counties hav been utterly ruined by such legislation, and the people hav had to abandon their farms because of the taxes. Beautiful self-government is this. And because we are so accustomed to it, like those born under the slave institution, we look on reform with abhorrence and reformers as "cranks." Under the present system what hav the voters to do with governing? What is governing? It is making and administering the laws. The parties select the candidates for all offices. All the average voter does is to go and cast his ballot for generally one out of two candidates. In selecting these candidates he has about as much to do as the man in the moon. Evidently whoever chooses the candidates is the master so far as that is concerned. The voter is a mere automaton. But the law-makers once chosen are supreme for the time, except for the very light restraint of a constitution. They gather at the capitol, where also assemble all those who hav some jobbing statute made. Combinations the most villainous are formed. "You vote for my bill and I will vote for yours," is the soul of the system. In spite of sudden spasmodic returns to virtue the evil grows. In the states it may be curable, but in the national Congress reform is impossible. It might not matter so much were it not that it results in such inequality of fortune among citizens and such intolerable burdens on the great masses of poor men, women, and children, that in time they are ripe for the inevitable change that must ensue. But, says Mr. Shallowpate, these masses do not hav any property out of which to pay taxes. "Why don't the people eat cake?" said some aristocrat when told they were mobbing the bakers because of scarcity of bread. The people don't pay taxes; they simply do not eat bread. Their burden of bad rule is discharged by involuntary privations.

It may be stated as an axiom that wherever the masses endure any privation the government is bad. In time the most patriotic people find this out and attack their government, which if free (so-called), is necessarily overthrown by the attack and converted into strong government, while strong governments thus attacked become still stronger. Despotism must ensue.

When it is proposed to put an end to these abuses by the one sole possible means, namely, to hav it so that no bill becomes a law until after the people vote on it, the objection arises, it is unpracticable, because there are too many bills to vote on. As though it were necessary to hav over one out of every thousand new laws proposed. We are so accustomed to this pest of lawmaking that, like the man with the seven-year itch, we deem it a constitutional necessity.

HOLT.

Eminent Women.

ERNESTINE L. ROSE.

Second only to Fanny Wright, comes Ernestine L. Rose, as one of my household gods, beloved, worshiped, and reverenced—enshrined in a lifetime of honored and sweet memories.

One of the first, if not the very first, articles I wrote for the press was a letter to the Boston Investigator in which I essayed to defend my idol from the stigma of being called "coarse" and "unwomanly."

She had visited us at my father's home, "Pious Hill," in Pleasant Valley, N. Y., and I had heard her lecture, and knew her for a really loving and lovely, womanly woman, and I felt indignant and hurt that anyone should so unkindly malign her, simply because she was a Radical reformer, and belonged to the sex which had no rights men were bound to respect.

Before I proceed further I want to apologize for using the name "Mrs. Rose" instead of Ernestine. We should insist on women keeping their own individual names, and being known by them wherever it is feasible. But Mrs. Rose won her laurels and honors under the name of Rose, and has thus made it so distinctivly her own that one forgets she has an owner to whom the name really belongs.

Ernestine Süsmund Potoski was born in 1810 at Pycterkow, in Poland.

Her father was a pious and learned rabbi, and in endeavoring to indoctrinate his daughter in the Jewish faith he found the child's questionings in regard to biblical facts and church creeds too difficult for him to reconcile with her ideas of right, justice, love, and mercy. So he tried to stop her investigations into the mysteries of holiness, by telling her that, "Little girls should not ask questions, or want to understand the object of the creed, but should accept and believe it."

The rabbi had a habit of fasting, so much that it injured his health and spirits, and one day Ernestine asked him why he did it, and being told that it was to please God, she exclaimed, "If God is pleased in making you sick and unhappy, I hate God!"

At the age of fourteen she renounced her belief in the Bible and the religion of her father, which brought down upon her great trouble and persecution, both from her own Jewish friends and from Christians.

When she was sixteen her father thought he would marry her to a pious Jew, and thus silence her objections to the "true" faith, thinking the cares, duties, and pleasures of married life would keep her from speculating upon the inconsistencies of religious dogmas and creeds. She protested, but in spite of all she could say she was betrothed to one she could not love. She begged him to refuse to marry her, but he only laughed at her and vowed to remain faithful to the engagement.

This compelled her to take a long and lonely journey in the dead of winter, to appeal to the higher powers.

The law freed her, and she returned home to find a young stepmother mistress of her father's house; and not being able to enjoy the new condition of things, she left and went to Berlin, where she rented a room and maintained herself mainly by selling a perfumed paper of her own invention.

In 1829 she embarked for England, was shipwrecked, and arrived there nearly destitute of everything save health, energy, and education.

She commenced teaching the languages, and added to her income by the sale of the perfumed paper, and found favor and friends.

Of her first appearance as a lecturer M. D. Conway wrote in a letter to the Cincinnati Commercial: "In the old days when Robert Owen was filling all England with his Socialistic ideas, and had built here in London a huge forum of Radicalism, almost as big as the Crystal Palace, a young and remarkably beautiful girl, just from Poland, was introduced to him. Discovering that she was a precocious Radical, and possessed of considerable ability, he invited her to speak in his huge hall, on an occasion when several thousands of people had gathered there. Notwithstanding her slight knowledge of the English language, the good looks and the enthusiasm of the girl made a good impression on the audience."

She has lectured in no less than twenty-three different states of the Union. "On several occasions she has addressed legislativ bodies with marked effect, advocating the necessity of legal redress for the wrongs and disabilities to which her sex are subject. As an advocate of woman's rights, antislavery, and religious liberty she has earned a world-wide celebrity. For fifty years a public speaker, during which period she has associated with the influential classes in Europe and America, and borne an activ part in the great progressiv movements which mark the present as the most glorious of historical epochs, Ernestine L. Rose has accomplished for the elevation of her sex, and the amelioration of our social conditions, a work which can be ascribed to few women of our time" (Hist. Woman Suffrage, vol. i, p. 97).

In reading at our Snowville Woman's Reading Club these three volumes of the "History of Woman Suffrage," it seemed to me there were no nobler and more effectiv words uttered than those by Mrs. Rose, and I was always delighted when it fell to my lot to read her soul-stirring sentences, and voice at second-hand her magnetic and thrilling ideas.

I remember reading the following incident from one of her speeches: "Two offenders were brought before a justice of New York. One was charged with stealing a pair of boots, for which offense he was sentenced to six months' imprisonment; the other crime was assault and battery of a husband upon his wife; he was let off with a reprimand from the judge! With my principles, I am entirely opposed to punishment, and hold that to reform the erring, and remove the causes of evil, is much more efficient, but the judge showed us the comparativ value of the two kinds of property. But then you must remember the boots were taken by a stranger, while the wife was insulted by her legal owner."

Continuing her speech, she says: "As long as woman shall be oppressed by unequal laws, so long will she be degraded by man. . . . There is no reason against woman's elevation, but there are deep-rooted, hoary-headed prejudices. The main cause of them is a pernicious falsehood propagated against her being, namely, that she is inferior by nature. Inferior in what? What has man ever done that woman, under the same advantages, could not do? In morals, bad as she is, she is generally considered his superior. In the intellectual sphere, giv her a fair chance before you pronounce a verdict against her. Cultivate the frontal portion of her brain as much as that of man is cultivated, and she will stand his equal, at least. Even now, where her mind has been called out at all, her intellect is as bright, as capacious, and as powerful as his."

When we remember these utterances are from a speech made nearly forty years ago, we see how far in advance of her age Mrs. Rose was. Comparativly few are now, in 1889, abreast of these sentiments.

In 1836, during her residence in London, she made the acquaintance of Mr. Rose, an Englishman of broad and liberal views—looking upon marriage as a simple contract. They were united by a magistrate instead of a priest.

Mr. Rose aided and encouraged his wife in her work for reform, and furnished her with money for making her extensiv lecturing-tours, so that she could voice her truths free of all cost to her hearers.

This good, brave worker for human happiness is still living in England, enjoying the supreme satisfaction of knowing she has lived down all the scorn and contumely of an ignorant past, and is now reverenced as one of the world's beloved and blessed saviors.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Mrs. Fiske and the "God-Fearing Woman."

I heard a good story the other day about that truly good—that truly human—woman, the late Mrs. Mary Fiske, at whose bier the eloquent Ingersoll delivered a most touching oration. When, in her great warm-heartedness, and not from mere impulse, Mrs. Fiske adopted a foundling, she at once advertised for a wet nurse. Among those who called was one of an inquiring turn of mind, who, after many questions and a critical gaze at Mrs. Fiske, said, "Why, you are a strong, healthy woman, madam, and why is it that you do not nurse the child yourself?" The case being explained to her, she exclaimed, her eyes in holy horror rolling:

"Oh, heavens! then the child was born out of wedlock! Oh, I can't hav anything to do with it, ma'm, for I'm a God-fearing woman—indeed I am, ma'm, a God-fearing woman!"

"A God fearing woman!" exclaimed Mrs. Fiske, with righteous indignation—"a God-fearing woman, eh? You are a God-damned woman! a God-damned woman!—that's what you are! Now get out of here—get out as quick as your God will let you—get!" And the "God-fearing woman," standing not upon the order, got out at once, another, with less "God-fearing" veneer, but more solid humanity, being shortly engaged to look after the little waif.

Westward.

July the 11th wife and babies and myself left Pittsville, Wis., for our new home in North Yamhill, Ore. I accompanied my wife as far as La Crosse, Wis., where she took the train for Missouri to visit friends, and I went on my route through Minnesota and Dakota, where I had lecture engagements.

My first lecture on the route was at Waterville, Minn., Sunday, July 14th. The place of meeting was in a delightful grove on the bank of a beautiful lake about a mile and a half from Waterville. This grove is on the farm of a Fred Pishel, a firm Liberal, who has evoluted from Catholicism. Mr. Pishel has my thanks for the efforts he put forth to make the meeting a success. A good platform was built and seats arranged for the audience. But to our great satisfaction the seats did not begin to hold the audience, but the platform was built at the foot of a hill which rose like an amphitheater, and the green grass made a nice carpet upon which the people rested. I was not only gratified but surprised with the large and enthusiastic audience that greeted me, as the farmers of that vicinity were at their harvest. It being the "Lord's day," however, the farmers thought they could spare that day for Freethought. Mr. Twing and family and Mr. Adams and family came from Elysian, and Mr. Brossard drove nearly twenty miles to attend the lecture.

On my tour last fall I gave six lectures in this vicinity—one at Smith's Mill, one at Elysian, and four at Waterville. This being my fifth lecture in Waterville, I feel truly thankful to the friends for the kind reception they gave me, and for their appreciation of my humble efforts.

The Liberals of Waterville and vicinity are as good as can be found in the land. It was with much pleasure that I again met with George R. Cowles and family, Liberal Spiritualists—Mr. Cowles is secretary of the Liberal club—Mr. Durand and wife, the Messrs. Brossards and families, and others whose names I hav forgotten.

The Liberals of Waterville are intending to hav Mr. Remsburg for three lectures soon, and later in the fall Mrs. Freeman. I hope by the time Mrs. Freeman gets there she can succeed in organizing a Secular Union for them, as the numbers are sufficient and the Liberals of the right kind.

From Waterville I came on to Lisbon, Dak., and was received at the depot by that grand, good Liberal, E. E. Harris, and driven eight miles into the country to their happy country home, where I enjoyed myself for a week.

E. E. Harris is a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER, his father is a subscriber to the Investigator, and his grandfather had been a constant reader of the Investigator from its first issue to the day of his death.

Mr. Harris and family are generous, warm-hearted people, and enthusiastic workers for Freethought, who believe there are principles involved that are worth doing more for than merely giving passiv assent to them. In the village of Lisbon there are a few good Liberals, but, as in most places, rather timid.

Mr. Charles Horne, of Buttsville; Mr. Dickenson and wife, of Plymouth; Mr. William Thayer and aged father and mother, and Mr. Rundell, of Fort Ransom, I found to be good, stalwart Freethinkers.

I delivered three lectures in Lisbon, but the friends made a mistake in charging an admission fee. The first night we had a fair-sized audience, the second night a little better, but the third night the church people rather outgeneraled us and succeeded in drawing off most of our audience. The day the lectures commenced, the Christians commenced a camp-meeting near by, and at some of the churches special meetings of some kind were held. But seeing that we were getting fair audiences, the church people began to get in their scare of boycott, the preachers did a great amount of personal work to keep the people away, and the last night an ice-cream social was given at the Methodist church, and the brass band employed to attract the people. Mr. Harris has lived in that county for several years, and is respected by all who know him, but after I arrived and the Christians saw that the lectures were going to be delivered, some of the ultra-pious ones refused even to speak to him. The Liberals of Lisbon could hardly realize to what a depth of meanness orthodoxy could sink.

Before I reached Lisbon the Methodist preacher had me slain, in fact I suppose he thought I was annihilated, and he was going to be on hand to shut off the Infidel. Friend Harris informing me of this, I promptly wrote a challenge, which was published in the papers of Lisbon, to any of the clergymen of Lisbon to meet me in a six-nights' debate. But none of them appeared at the lectures or accepted the challenge.

After the course of lectures at Lisbon I delivered a lecture at Fort Ransom in a beautiful grove on the banks of the Cheyenne river, where we had a good audience. The Liberals of Lisbon are intending to hear Mrs. Freeman this fall. They are determined to giv the orthodox another shaking up before they let them go.

I am now in the land of the "setting sun," where I shall commence work in the school-room again in September. I shall soon visit the friends at McMinnville, where I shall probably deliver lectures at stated intervals during the year. GEORGE H. DAWES.

North Yamhill, Ore.

God in the Constitution.

From the Fargo, N. D., Sunday Argus.

Even a bad reputation nobly earned is pleasing.—Seneca.

In the issue of the daily Argus for August 6th, I addressed a letter to the constitutional convention entitled, "What Deity?" in which I attempted to hav a little common-sense talk with the delegates concerning the mention of God in the constitution. My remarks were based entirely upon principle, and constructed with a view of respecting the opinion of at least a respectable minority. In it I attacked no religion nor creed nor made any stricture upon the personal religious convictions of anyone, except wherein that belief became tinged with intolerance, and attempted to override the rights and liberties of others.

I say intolerance, because it is this spirit which constructed the preamble to the constitution in spite of a respectable minority opposed to it. If there were anything to be gained by the mention of God in the constitution, then there would be an excuse, but there is absolutely nothing gained, and it is simply the first principle of law—brute force—asserting itself in the name of an unhealthy religious sentiment.

In the Sunday Argus of August 11th, the spleen of intolerance overflowed into an article entitled, "On the Lord's Side," signed "Polonius." I am not surprised at the spirit of the bigotry displayed in this article. It is of the same kind that disregards the desires of minorities, although gaining nothing by the victory.

It is one of the curious phases of humanity that however good, kind, generous, or noble the man is in all walks of life, the moment one differs from him in religious matters all of sweetness in him turns to gall.

It is also strange that the Christian looks with so much distrust and condemnation upon one who believes in another religion or believes in none at all. Some of the finest men in our city are Liberals and Agnostics, and what is found here is found the world over.

It is a historical fact that every great reformer the world has ever seen was considered an Infidel at the time he lived. Every student of history, be he Christian or otherwise, finds and accepts the fact that history continually repeats itself.

Does not this truth still hold good?

The spirit of religious intolerance has caused more pain, more suffering, more anguish, more ignorance, than all other causes combined. Even Christ, that gentlest of mankind, said: "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned" (Mark xvi, 16). It may be a truth, but if he were God could he not hav altered it? Paul, after preaching a sermon on charity, advised the Galatians as follows: "If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye hav received, let him be accursed" (Gal. i, 9).

It was religious intolerance that caused the massacre of twenty millions of Infidels in the several Crusades; that burnt a thousand witches at Como, Italy, in 1516; that burnt William Tyndale in 1536 for printing a Bible; that made John Calvin condemn Michael Servetus, Oct. 27, 1553, on the charge of heresy; that burnt William Hunter in 1555 for reading a Bible; that burnt John Rogers the same year; that killed about one hundred thousand Huguenots; that burnt seventeen thousand witches in Scotland from 1564 to 1603, and forty thousand in England from 1600 to 1680; that burnt Giordano Bruno, Feb. 16, 1600; that banished Roger Williams from Massachusetts, Jan., 1636, for simply advocating equal protection to all forms of religion and the repealing of all laws compelling attendance at church; that prompted the ecclesiastical synod held in Boston, Nov., 1637, to banish Anne Hutchinson and her associates because she dared to put her own interpretation upon the scriptures; that fined, imprisoned, and then banished six persons from Massachusetts in 1639 for attempting to organize a Baptist society; that hanged Mary Dyer in 1660 because she was a Quaker; that hanged Rev. George Burrough in 1692 for asserting that witches did not exist; that killed nineteen as witches at Salem by torture and hanging in 1692; that imprisoned and broke up the seminary of Miss Prudence Crandall in 1833, at Canterbury, Conn., for teaching young negro girls; that mobbed William Lloyd Garrison in Boston, in 1835, for advocating the abolition of slavery; that dismissed Miss Barrett, aged sixteen years, from the Methodist Female College at Pittsburgh, Pa, in 1866, for having a strain of negro blood in her veins; that still persecutes, imprisons, and fines in the name of religion. The list could be continued almost ad infinitum. The foregoing will suffice for the present.

The spirit of intolerance is by no means dead. Like the mustard seed it is hidden in the breast of man awaiting the proper condition of religious disturbances to cause it to germinate and grow and destroy the field. For many reasons there will be a bitter fight against the constitution. The fact that it has in a measure connected itself with the church will but add fuel to the flame. It may be carried, but in this instance, it seems to me the converse of statesmanship to add an objectionable feature simply to satisfy a sentiment, thereby increasing the danger at the polls, and which, if won, will be but a victory without reward. I feel sure that if the preamble were left to be last voted upon by the convention it would never pass. O tempora! O mores! Blessed be those brave spirits who subjugated self for the benefit of mankind! Oh, blessed be that liberty of thought and act which politics avoids!

To "Polonius" I would say with Anaxagoras: "My first care is for my country, pointing toward heaven."

I would also ask some of the delegates to hold up to themselvs the mirror of self-examination and see if they do not reflect the real Polonius:

Hamlet: Do you see yonder cloud, that's almost in shape of a camel?
Polonius: By the mass, and 'tis like a camel indeed.
Hamlet: Methinks, it is like a weasel.
Polonius: It is backed like a weasel.
Hamlet: Or, like a whale?
Polonius: Very like a whale.

SAUL.

To Goliath.

O great Goliath of the days of Saul
And David, more particularly David,
Before whose deadly sling you quickly cav-ed,
Where now thy puissance so broad and tall?
O what a fall was there, gigantic one,
When you went down before that little duffer—
Out like a candle light before a snuffer—
A sling, a swing, a spring, the deed was done!
How sharper than a serpent's tooth by far,
To be knocked out by such a little bantam—
A hundred such you'd guarantee to plant 'em,
But thou wert planted, thou, great man of war!
O giant most gigantic grown in Gath,
Cold day for thee when David crossed thy path!

Shall Public Money Be Used for Sectarian Schools?

D. A. Buckley, Editor, in the Cambridge News (Roman Catholic).

The above question, which is one of the hour, is assuming national importance. The feeling among the people is indicativ of a condition of insecurity in relation to the subject.

"A stitch in time saves nine," or "an ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

Coming events cast their shadows before, and the handwriting on the wall clearly points to a national struggle in the near future, unless by taking time by the forelock the question is settled now and forever by an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as is now proposed and urged upon the leading men of the nation.

We, and every humane person and lover of the country, would deplore a sectarian strife or war, which in our opinion can only be evaded by settling it, this religious question, now upon a permanent basis.

The Catholic laity should, and undoubtedly will, hail it with delight as a consummation most devoutly to be wished and prayed for, as by settling the question in this manner it will remove one of the most serious bones of contention and strife from men and women whose mission should be, and is, to liv together in unity and harmony.

We hav had enough of war. Let us hav peace and all laws and amendments tending to preserve and perpetuate it.

How They Look on Him There.

From the Oil City Derrick.

Last Sunday the people of Warren, Pa., were treated to an exhibition of Col. Elliott F. Shepard, editor of the New York Mail and Express. As president of the American Sabbath Union, he delivered an address from the pulpit of the Rev. Dr. Fradenberg's church. It was a plea for the Christian Sabbath. The speaker modestly instituted a comparison between himself and the emperor Charles V., greatly to the advantage of the colonel. He then plunged into his speech, but as it was evident he had made no especial preparation for that particular occasion, but was relying upon the memory of past addresses, the audience was regaled with a somewhat incoherent review of the present Sabbatical condition of Asia, Europe, and America, largely interspersed with the traveled colonel's personal experience with Syriac sheiks and other notables of the far-off corners of the world, together with some very curious and marvelous interpretations of history.

More Christs.

Frederick Stern, a colored doctor of Scotsboro, Ala., has made a sensation among the people of his own race by the cures which he professes to hav made by the laying on of hands. He rubs the ailing portion of the patient's body, and the patient has a tingling sensation like that produced by a mild current of electricity. The other doctors and the newspapers at Scotsboro denounce Stern as a fraud. Several persons afflicted for years with chronic diseases say they hav been cured by Stern in a few hours without the aid of medicins. The negroes almost worship Stern, and are firm in the belief that he possesses supernatural powers.

WE take pleasure in presenting to our readers this week the first instalment of an article by John Peck, which will continue through several numbers. We know that our subscribers will be delighted. If there is anything in the world that is more delectable, refreshing, cheering, invigorating, amusing, and useful all in one than this man's writing, we would like to know what it is. Large-minded, straightforward, veracious, fearless, witty, and as clear and plain as the light of day—John Peck is an apostle such as it rarely falls to our lot to enjoy, and one that we should appreciate while we hav him.

Death of Horace Seaver.

It is with feelings of the profoundest regret that we announce to our readers the death of Horace Seaver. He died just before noon on the 21st inst., at his residence, No. 2727 Washington street, Boston. He had been troubled with an affection of the heart for a long time, and for some six months past had been confined to the house. The immediate cause of his death was dropsy.

Mr. Seaver was born in Boston on Aug. 25, 1810, and would thus hav been seventy-nine years of age had he lived till one more Sunday. He was of New England stock, and the second son of Nathaniel and Anna Seaver. From the first he gave evidence of an ability that made him conspicuous among his companions. Young Seaver was educated in the Boston public schools, and his readiness to promote them and defend them from their Catholic foes in after years showed how grateful he was to them. He wished to be an actor; his folks wished him to be a clergyman. Finally he went to Plymouth, and served an apprenticeship as printer. It was during his stay in this town and through his attendance at the meetings of a local debating society that his first doubts regarding orthodoxy in religion seem to hav been suggested. How much these doubts were intensified, when, as a journeyman, he traveled to Albany, and there heard the famous Robert Dale Owen, is shown by the fact that after this experience Seaver decided to reject the clerical and retain only the pagan element of his name. Up to this time he had been known as Horace Holly Seaver, Holly having been conferred in memory of a once famous Unitarian minister; but after his change of convictions, the young man not only decided to reject the Holly and remain simple Horace Seaver, but also gave up all aspirations after the ministerial career. In 1837 an incident occurred which determined in an important manner all the subsequent course of Seaver's life. He came to Boston, and took work on the Investigator as a compositor. The time was an exciting one, for the editor of that journal, Mr. Abner Kneeland, had just been prosecuted, convicted, and sent to jail for the crime of blasphemy. Seaver visited the editor in prison, and his experience during this episode gave the finishing touch to the convictions of the young Rationalist. The compositor, full of hatred, not for men, but for priestcraft and superstition in all their forms, soon budded out into a contributor, and so apt and striking was his literary work, that when, in 1838, Mr. Kneeland retired from the editorial chair to go West, Horace Seaver was promptly invited to guide the fortunes of the Investigator, and he accepted the position. At that time Mr. J. P. Mendum had assumed control of the paper, and Mr. Seaver's installation into the editorial chair was the beginning of that remarkable partnership between the two men which has lasted, without the slightest break in the pleasantness of their relation, for over half a century. Mr. Mendum a day or two ago spoke thus, with tears in his eyes: "My friend was quite aware of his approaching end, yet he manifested no concern other than regret at having to leave his friends. We hav been together for over fifty years, and our relations hav always been of the most pleasant character. He was one of the most genial and gentlemanly men I ever knew. He was not a man given to ridicule of his opponents, or of other people's opinions; he always met men with argument. But," added Mr. Mendum, "the loss is too recent for me to say any more."

Mr. Seaver was a man of commanding presence, dignified in manner, courteous in conversation, and able in debate. He loved discussion, even with his opponents, for he regarded it as the great promoter of truth. Hospitaller Hall, in the early days, often resounded with the stirring struggles in which he measured his powers with those of oratorical antagonists. He was prominent in quite a number of Freethought conventions, and when, at one of these held in Albany, it became a question whether the Freethinkers of America should accept the word "Infidels" as a proper designation, it was Seaver's influence which determined the reply given in the affirmativ. He was not afraid to be called an Infidel.

Most of Mr. Seaver's life was passed in the office of the Investigator in the midst of the books and exchanges he liked so much to peruse. Either here, on public platforms, or in private as a welcome guest, he met and came into intimate and friendly relations with reformers like Garrison, Wendell Phillips, Theodore Parker, Charles Bradlaugh, Holyoake, Ingersoll, Parker Pillsbury, and many others. In his private life, Mr. Seaver had many qualities that made him lovable. His charity was unstinted and his interest in schemes of benevolence was great. Of his life work it has been said that he molded Liberal thought and modified Puritanic ideas to an extent impossible adequately to describe, while his writings, in the words of Colonel Ingersoll, "hav Liberalized a continent."

In a late lecture Mr. Seaver spoke upon these points which we are treating now. It was at Paine Memorial Hall, Nov. 22, 1885, the subject being "Fifty Years' Experience in Liberalism." He began his address by stating that he had not always been a Liberal and an Infidel. He began life, he said, like most, as a Christian, but fortunately for him, he got emancipated, and had never regretted it. His first ambition was to be an actor. His parents, however, thought he might make a good minister, and be sent out West, like Horace Greeley. Happily, he became a printer, and if there was one mighty business in the world, it was that of printing. To be a printer, he said, was greater than to be a sailor or a soldier, or even a minister. The public could do without ministers. If the sun were to rise to-morrow upon this land without ministers and without churches, and only the press should remain, people would be far better off. The whole of theology was founded in conjecture and guesswork. What people wanted was knowledge. It was need that caused so many able men to remain in the church. A clergyman once prophesied that the speaker would be a bright and particular light in the church. If only that minister could see him now, he would recognize that he was not much of a prophet. The whole of the thought of the world was drifting the way of the Infidels. They had the best orator on their side to be found in any country. Tyndall, Huxley, and the other scientists were all on their side. Finally, Mr. Seaver said that after fifty years' experience of Liberalism he liked it better than ever, and meant to continue in it until time rang down the curtain and the glamour of life was over.

Early in life Mr. Seaver married a lady of a congenial mind, and with her he lived a wedded life of almost unalloyed happiness. He buried her many years ago, and has since lived a widower, rich in the memories her life left behind. At her funeral he deviated from orthodox usages and held the ceremony in accordance with his own ideas of the fitting. He addressed the mourners, and his address is read in pamphlet form and admired for its eloquence and its sentiments.

Dr. H. G. Newton, Mr. Seaver's physician, relates many anecdotes of the deceased. Among other things, he relates that Mr. Seaver once expressed himself as desiring no further immortality than to continue his work with Mr. Mendum, and that when he finally had to face death he repeated that that was still all he desired. The doctor and other friends took care to prevent any possible misrepresentation of Mr. Seaver's dying sentiments by the pious but mendacious. At the death there were present the doctor, the nurse, and a sister-in-law by the name of Mrs. Seaver, who can all testify that he died as he had lived, an uncompromising, fearless Freethinker. The doctor took down, stenographically, his last considerable conversation, about two weeks previous to his death; it was interesting, and will be published later.

Colonel Ingersoll once wrote that it was the Investigator's fifty-odd years of constant advocacy of liberty that had made it possible for him to travel through the country lecturing to thousands. There is truth in this, and it was Mr. Seaver's brain which made the Investigator. He was a thorough, patient, persistent editor, and forced the unwilling pietists of New England to hear him. He did a great work indeed.

What are the feelings that must be touched, and the avenues of reflection that must be opened, by this death, our readers feel and know as well as we. Of the value of a life like that of Mr. Seaver, no thoughtful man needs to be told. In a world where most seem little more than boys, than unreasoning automatons, to be manipulated by false-hearted schemers, while by their incapacity all hav to suffer—in this world Mr. Seaver was a man with the gift of reason, to see under appearances, penetrate shams, pierce to the inner truth of things with the subtil power of logic, and publish to his fellows in what quarter their interests lie. In a world where moral cowardice and base spiritless disloyalty to truth envelop and well-nigh extinguish all, Mr. Seaver was a man with firm and intrepid determination to speak out his truths in total disregard of all the sneers and scoffs and disrespect that could issue from angered ignorance and detected fraud. He was veracious, he was frank, he was benevolent, he was courteous, he was gentle. He was an honor to our cause, he was an ornament to his generation, he was one of those few for whose goodness we learn to forgiv the shortcomings of the rest of mankind and love it after all. To say now what would hav rendered superfluous all the preceding, he was a friend of Robert Ingersoll. Let him hav honor and gratitude and remembrance—and let all try to be like him.

The Persecuted Spiritualists.

The Michigan state Association of Spiritualists has resolved in regard to the arrest of Dr. Reid that it "considers the attack to be a case of malicious religious persecution." We consider it precisely the same. It is a persecution by a large and powerful body believing one way as to a future state, of a smaller and less powerful body believing another way as to a future state. We do not wish any of our readers who may be Materialists to ignore the principle involved. The records of the past demonstrate on every page the fatal results to all of allowing interference by such large bodies with small ones. It is of vital necessity that we maintain the principle of inviolability of religious belief, and resolutely meet all encroachers with a "Hands off." And the only way to do this is to watch and guard the liberty of each as jealously as though it were the liberty of all. Suppose the Spiritualists should now turn around and obtain, in some vicinity where they predominate, the arrest of a preacher for assuming to possess influence with supernatural beings, would not the action be as just? People must learn that the only way to eliminate error is by free discussion. If either Spiritualists or their opponents are wrong, the facts are certainly capable of being finally laid open to all in course of civil and public argument, and the matter will then be settled forever. This is the way, and the only right way. To the elucidation of the problem in this way we hav always given what space in our columns we could spare from Antichristian matter, fairly distributed between arguers pro and con; as to the method by force, that is the wrong way, and we shall never cease to protest against it.

The fact is, the Christians are irritated with the Spiritualists for being more rational and fair than they. Voltaire remarked that the Quakers offended the leaders of other sects unpardonably by setting up the dangerous precedent of having no fixed and salaried heads. Likewise Christians now are alarmed at seeing a body whose teachings are so much better than their own. Christians claim the right of coercion; Spiritualists disclaim it. Spiritualists recommend the study of science; Christians discourage it. Spiritualists giv in the main a free platform; Christians refuse it. Christians disrupt science, and confuse and terrify man, with a dualism of evil matter and nature on one hand, and something distinct in essence, supernatural, called spirit, on the other; Spiritualists proclaim that nature is a unity, that all is natural, and in their affirmations of spirit mean by it nothing beyond a natural force at one with all the other forces of nature. "There is," says Mr. B. F. Underwood at the close of an argument against the possibility of spiritual manifestations, "so much in the theory and history of modern Spiritualism that is in marked contrast to the popular theology; its teachings in many respects are so far in advance of those of the churches; its literature so much more Liberal and in keeping with the spirit of the century; its press and its platform so comparativly free, and the intelligent and informed among its adherents so much more courteous and generous in the treatment of its opponents, that it has required from me something of a sacrifice of personal feeling to offer the criticisms which I hav uttered, and which I believe justice and impartiality demand." We do not think that even the most extreme Materialist can afford to allow the Christian bigots, who would crush him and every other dissenter if they dared, to persecute a class like this.

As to any plea of the necessity of excluding from the mails fraudulent communications, we will say that it would be better to allow a thousand times as many cheating advertisers to use the mails as do now, than to open the way to central national censorship of the private affairs of the citizens. We always antagonized governmental meddling with the mails, and always shall. So will everyone who will familiarize himself with the ways of state despotism in the past and the imprudence of allowing the first and littlest encroachments. No one knows what national troubles may arise in the future in which it may be of vast importance whether or not we hav kept the mails inviolate.

Dr. Whitford Thanked.

We are very glad to learn of a piece of work done at the Montana convention by Dr. O. B. Whitford. This gentleman all our readers will remember as a veteran contributor to THE TRUTH SEEKER, author of several Antichristian books, and stanch Freethought worker in every way. We will giv a dispatch to a local paper, the Inter Mountain, descriptiv of his doings:

"HELENA, MT., July 16th.—The convention session to-day was of a lively character and a feeling of partisanship was developed, which approached the verge of a wrangle. A sensation, which soon created a feeling of surprise and disgust, was the result of the submission by Warren of a communication from O. B. Whitford, remonstrating against the Sunday law. It was a vicious assault upon the Christian and Methodist conference, which recently petitioned the conference to insert as a provision in the constitution a stringent article to suppress the violations of the law and enforce the proper observance of the Sabbath day. His language was severe in the extreme. He asserts that the Sabbath day and all religions are prominent in the Constitution of the United States only by their entire absence, and that the Christian Sabbath has absolutely no authority to bind the conscience of an American citizen. The statements are samples of the tenor of the entire communication. The members soon began to show evidence of dissatisfaction and a desire to shut off the reading of the document. Finally, after patience had ceased to be a virtue, Delegate Burleigh arose, and in a tone of indignation moved to suspend further consideration of the matter. A vote on this proposition was carried by forty-six affirmativ and seven negativ. It was referred to a committee of thirteen on miscellaneous subjects, and probably will never see the light of day again."

In the editorial columns of the same paper is this:

"For the personal character of Dr. O. B. Whitford the Inter Mountain has entire respect. It knows him for an honest man and a good citizen. What his religious convictions are is nobody's business so long as they do not contemplate an infraction of the law. Yet this journal questions the propriety of his sending to the constitutional convention such a document as was submitted to that body to-day, a document whose suggestions are in conflict with the accepted doctrins of Christianity throughout the civilized world. The recognition of God in the constitution may not be strictly necessary, but it isn't going to hurt anybody, and will meet with the indorsement of ninety-nine hundredths of the people of Montana."

We hav some remarks to make on this.

"The Inter Mountain knows Dr. Whitford for an honest man and a good citizen."

We feel pretty confident, too, that if it knows any other Freethinkers it knows them for honest men and good citizens also. We do not believe it can say the same of all the Christians it knows. Why does it not occur to the Inter Mountain that it might be as well to giv the doctrin of the honest citizen some show and not be quite so eager in putting forward the doctrin of the bad citizens? Maybe there is something in the belief of the latter that works to keep them from being like Dr. Whitford, honest men and good citizens. Has the Inter Mountain investigated to see whether there is not? Has it examined these things?

"What his religious convictions are is nobody's business."

Then how are anybody's religious convictions anybody's business, and what are they stuck into the constitution for?

"——so long as they do not contemplate an infraction of the law."

That class of men in America that are the most fanatically Christian are also the very class that do openly and avowedly contemplate an infraction of the law. More, they contemplate an entire overthrowing of the law. These are the Romanists. They contemplate an entire overthrowing of our free government and a substitution of a despotism with their present foreign sovereign, the pope, at its head. If, leaving this wholesale infraction of the law, we consider less infractions, the class that commits these least is that class that Dr. Whitford stands for, and the class that commits them most is that very class that we spoke of as the most fanatically religious. The class that commits them most is that very class that is most devoted to that God whom our pious contemporary wants recognized in the constitution.

"This journal questions the propriety of sending to the convention a document whose suggestions are in conflict with the accepted doctrins of Christianity throughout the civilized world."

We fear that that paper would "question the propriety of sending to a convention a document conflicting with doctrins" of any kind that were accepted. We fear that it knows no more than to look to whatever it finds accepted, as the truth; to look to majorities for wisdom, and servilely to ape the prevailing prejudice, for policy.

Would the Inter Mountain "question the propriety of sending to the convention a document conflicting with the accepted doctrins of" Mohammedanism? Yet if not, why not? What right can the convention possibly hav to discriminate between Mohammedanism and Christianity? Is not doing so to a certain extent establishing by state a particular religion? Is this what the fathers of the republic contemplated?

What we "question the propriety of" is the sending by these pietists of a document conflicting with the doctrins of separateness of church and state accepted throughout America.

"The recognition of God in the constitution may not be strictly necessary."

It is strictly unnecessary. In fact, it is strictly injurious. That all this sort of thing is strictly injurious, history evidences with her most tragic and portentous lessons.

"But it won't hurt anybody."

It will. This recognition of the prevailing superstition by the state is estimated to hav hurt ninety millions of men, since the appearance of Christianity, to the extent of depriving them of life, either in religious wars or by slow torture. And yet this is but a little item in the hurt it has done. It has done a work a thousand times as hideous and damnable in its suppression of science, medical and of every kind that would hav preserved, advanced, and elevated human life.

"It will meet with the indorsement of ninety-nine hundredths of the people in Montana."

False. If it were true, the crime would remain precisely the same. If there were in Montana only one person who differed with the rest in his belief as to a future life, his feelings should be as inviolable as those of a hundred thousand. The clearest lesson of experience is that the first condition of progress is the freedom of every minority and every individual from majority dictation of belief.

The Inter Mountain would better take a little time from its efforts to keep the bearings of politicians and popular prejudice, and apply it to study of history and to disciplin in manly honesty, sincerity, and freedom.

Editorial Notes.

THE question has already come up, "Shall we keep the 1892 Exposition open Sundays?" We will observe that if it is not opened Sundays, there will be one of the biggest rows ever raised on Manhattan island, and in that row we intend to take not a minor or a feeble part.

WE hav incautiously mailed to bookbuyers our last copy of that useful work exposing the crimes of convents, "Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures." We need a copy to use in getting out a new edition, and if one of our readers will send us one, we shall be grateful.

WHILE Rationalists and scientists are meditating in their studies cures for our social ills or discovering in their laboratories the physical laws that we can utilize in bettering our material lot, Christians and Moslems are making the island of Crete a hell of religious hatred, outrage, and bloodshed.

THE New Jersey Sabbath Union at its annual convention just held at Ocean Grove passed this resolution:

"That we tender our thanks to the president of the United States for his special order doing away with all Sunday parades in the army of the United States, and also to Postmaster-General Wanamaker for his special order closing the department at Washington to all visitors and employees on the Sabbath."

It was announced to the meeting that Secretary Blaine had ordered the American department of the Paris Exposition closed on Sabbaths.

EIGHT immigrants from Syria are detained at Castle Garden pending an investigation into their financial condition. On a late morning the Syrians were noticed going about and gazing at the pictures on the advertising cards hung in the rotunda. As each one was inspected the foreigners would turn away with a look of disappointment on their faces. Over the cigar stand at one end of the rotunda, hangs a portrait of Robert G. Ingersoll. When the party came to this picture its members appeared delighted, and in an instant they were on their knees. Raising their hands in a devotional way they began to pray, addressing their prayers to the picture that hung before them. After half an hour spent in this manner they rose from their knees and returned to their corner with a look of peace and content on their countenances. The sight of the men and women praying before a portrait of the famous Freethinker was so odd that the officials made inquiries of the Syrians as to the cause. Then it was learned that the picture of "Our Bob" had been taken for that of St. Peter, and with that impression they had performed their devotion before it. It was with difficulty that the officials could restrain their laughter upon hearing this explanation. They did not explain to the foreigners their mistake. But our Syrian friends may be assured that they never prayed to a man more good and great, nor as much so; and also that they will get just the amount of supernatural aid from the colonel that they hav ever got from their patrons of elder standing.

THE Concordia, Kan., Blade has its opinions on the destruction of the Alexandrian library. It is inclined to think that the Christian attack on it left little to be destroyed by the Mohammedans. And it doubts that the books could hav been used for combustible purposes. The supposed distribution of the books for those purposes, it observes, was 642 A.D., long before the invention of paper and when all writing was done on parchment—the skin of a sheep or a goat dressed and made fit to write upon. This material, says the Blade, would not burn even as well as water-soaked cottonwood. The view of our contemporary is that when Christianity arose there arose also a natural hostility to the library, and it ceased to be an object of care by the government, and then, as similarly is the case now, as soon as the protecting arm of the government was withdrawn it went to ruin. Some of the books were kicked around the floors of the building, just as certain public documents are now, finally to be dumped in the wastepile. Many of them may hav been, and in all probability were, carried away by some as curiosities, by others because of the value they possessed; and many of those latter may yet be found in some of the hidden recesses of that once great and, intellectually, foremost country of the world. It is not at all improbable that the library suffered largely by the siege of Alexandria by Julius Cæsar. That was inevitable, but it was a vast institution long after that, and it is owing entirely to the spread of Christianity that it went to ruin. With the rise of that superstition education declined, and a feeling arose, that reached a mania, to destroy all evidence that in any way conflicted with the story of its foundation. At all events the story that sheepskin was used for kindling-wood, concludes our Kansas friend, is very improbable. We will say on this that the kindling material story is the one given by all the cyclopedias and antiquarian works, and the men who wrote them are just the ones who know best about the properties of parchment. Our friend has not informed itself on the details of the nature and use of fuel in those days. We use green logs for fuel now. Perhaps the parchments were burnt with difficulty, and the motiv was not the desire for useful fuel but the wish to get the manuscripts out of the world in some way. Still, our friend may be right. Conclusions of savans and professors are not to be accepted without scrutiny, on this or any other point.

Letters from Friends.

STEUBENVILLE, O., Aug. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am pleased to see a few lines in THE TRUTH SEEKER this week from our old friend, Thomas Winter. I hav called on him once or twice when in Cincinnati, and it is almost an inspiration to be in his company. To hear him talk on the possibilities of the future with the enthusiasm of youth—though he is bent double with the weight of eighty years—would cheer up the veriest pessimist that ever lived, and givs me faith in the future welfare of mankind. Still, when I begin to think of the powerful strides the Catholic church is making, and the war it is making on our public schools, and the apathy of the great mass of the people, I say, is it possible after one single century that the people who started out so nobly shall allow their liberties to be taken from them without one word of protest until they are so far enslaved that it will be too late? I see by a Cleveland paper that two more towns in New York state hav given up their free schools to the tender mercies of the priests, by a vote of the people, the Catholics having the majority, and we may expect in a few years to see the majority of our towns and cities voting the same way if we continue to make citizens of the scum of all the Catholic nations. O that the people might open their eyes in time to save this grand heritage from the blasting breath of that sum of all villainies, the Catholic church! J. D.

BUTTE, MONT., Aug. 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The editor of the Inter-Mountain may well say he respects Dr. O. B. Whitford, who dropped an Agnostic bomb in the Montana convention, for a better man at home and abroad never lived than the doctor. To know him is to respect and honor him, and if only one-tenth of the "ninety-nine hundredths" were worthy to carry the doctor's old shoes, there would be some weight in the criticisms on the doctor's belief.

If Butte is a fair sample of God's chosen children in Montana, I do not wonder they want him in the constitution, for he cannot be anywhere else. A person has only to be here a short time to be convinced that God's children pay very little attention to their father's commands, and although there are seven or eight churches, they do not seem to make their frequenters come anywhere near the level of the Freethinkers in all that makes a good citizen.

I hav been in many cities both East and West, but I hav yet to find a place where vice flaunts her wickedness so openly as here, and the future will be still worse, as there has been a large parochial school built, where a thousand or more children will be taught solely for God's and the Catholic church's glory.

Possibly, now they hav got God in the constitution, he may be able to make those who believe on him take a little more care to practice what they preach.

Fraternally yours, LORENA A. BEAUVAL.

KENTON, O., Aug. 14, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As you are seeking after truth, I will giv you a few grains from this part of the vinyard. We are blessed with about as many churches as Christ was with apostles, and they are about as reliable. But what I want to speak of is the Catholic doctrin. If their catechism is reliable, it is a deadly sin to withhold from another what justly belongs to him. Did Purcell when he died and beat his dupes out of about $5,000,000 commit that sin? I asked that of a good Catholic. He told me the church was paying his shortage and that makes atonement for his mistake. I admitted that was good policy to frighten their dupes out of their money to pay the amount their holy father stole from a lot of people who were too ignorant to know that national banks were more reliable than Purcell, but if money will make atonement for his shortcomings, what is the good of saying so many masses for him, or if masses are any good why pay the money? But the worst feature of the whole affair is that there are, according to the Cincinnati daily press, scores of the good bishop's victims who fill lunatic asylums and premature graves because they lost their money. The church will probably call the pope in to fix that part of the unfortunate affair. There is one of the good bishop's victims here in this town who toiled for years and earned a small competence and gave it to the man of God to keep for her, and he carried out his part of the agreement to the letter, but when the good man died and went to heaven her money went to the other place and she went crazy. So everything went. The church can beg money to pay every cent of this man's debt, but they can never restore those poor creatures to reason or bring those to life who died from grief over their losses. I am a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER. GEORGE BAKER.

COQUILLE CITY, ORE., Aug. 5, 289.

MR. EDITOR: The Liberals of Coos county, under the leadership of the far-seeing, hospitable J. Henry Schroder, hav accomplished a work of which we may well feel proud. The first attack on orthodoxy was that of Professor Seymour, whose happy theme is the science of man. The professor defeats organized ignorance by exposing the vice and immorality it fosters, and by teaching the principles by which mankind can attain a loftier civilization than orthodoxy has dreamed of.

The next to fall in line was that brilliant champion of "Liberty and Morality"—a good companion, earnest speaker, and profound thinker. The clear peals of our Bell are still surging against the pillars of orthodoxy.

The cause has received a new impulse by another annual visit of that indefatigable worker, poet, and philosopher, Samuel P. Putnam. He delivered lectures at the leading owns on Coos bay and Coquille river, but probably the most interesting of all was the picnic at Arago. The steamer made a special trip to the grounds. People gathered from all points. The band from Myrtle Point, joining that of Arago, furnished music for the occasion. After the meeting of the Secular Union the Schroeder family invited the crowd to a most wholesome dinner, which was spread under some beautiful trees near the hall. This was really a Liberal picnic—a day of sunshine and joy, of poetry and song, of music and merriment. Such is only a glimpse of what this world shall be when we become Secularized—when we recognize that happiness is a reward of virtue, and here the place and now the time to become worthy and reap those rewards.

Yours for the triumph of Secularism, T. P. BRINEGAR.

NEWARK, Aug. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The pope has a large family to support in Rome. To be sure, he has $30,000,000 in his strong-box to keep them, and a salary of £300,000 a year. His cardinals receive $5,100 a year to support them. Heirs to the throne must be supported in princely style. A man informs the Newark people through the Newark Daily News that the poor Irish fishermen in Ireland stand in need of fishing vessels. Now, if that is a fact, and not a fake, the pope could spare them one year's salary and not miss it, or he could discharge his cardinals, nuncios, and papal guard. An honest and holy man needs no soldiers. Christ had no soldiers to keep him, only to guard him in prison and to lead him to the place of execution—if he ever existed, which is not known for a fact. Professor Wilder asserts there never was a Christ, and I would believe him quicker than the paid theologian. The pope's prelates could be discharged, for the pope is the judge and the court too. What it costs to run the papal court would buy a good-sized fishing fleet. Or the money the faithful Irish sent to the holy father the year of the famin in Ireland would keep them now. The Italians of New York claim the Irish rule and hav got all the offices. Now, instead of the poor Irish contributing to send to their poor countrymen to build fishing fleets, let the Irish who hold office and get large pay for doing nothing send some of their lucre; for they are the true Christians, who hav their grips, signs, and pass-words to gain admittance in their society known as the Sons of Ease, or Here We Rest. Tammany Society is their heaven in New York, and the head sachems are their saints. I suppose there is a chance for some heavy-weight to be elected, for their chairman has resigned. Perhaps some day the legislature will do away with political societies, especially Tammany saints. Now, I don't know what the next cry will be for Ireland unless it will be to pay all their passages to America, for there are a great many more cities that need policemen, justices, judges, senators, legislators, and aldermen. There are more blocks or squares to be sold for one dollar, to build a charity hospital on one end and a large cathedral in front. I think it time the people made an effort to claim their property voted away by aliens. Respectfully, W. W. MORRIS.

SANTA ANA, CAL., Aug. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I wish to correct an error in the latter part of J. M. Beall's letter, on page 490 of THE TRUTH SEEKER. He says, "You will hav to produce some stronger proof of the existence of ghosts, than your little slate-writing trick, before you can convince the level-headed readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the reality of your ghost, for Mr. Hermann can double discount that trick any day in the week."

I hav practiced sleight-of-hand tricks more or less for forty years, and hav investigated the writing of messages between closed slates, in my own family, for ten years, and I know that while it is true that trick slate-writing can be, and often is, performed, yet it is also true that neither Mr. Hermann nor any other prestidigitator can show writing on slates never touched by himself nor his accomplices.

Mr. Beall shows his woeful ignorance both of sleight-of-hand performing and of so-called Spiritualistic phenomena. I hav carefully studied both in my own house and among my own family, and while some of the latter phenomena can be simulated by the conjurer, there are others he will never attempt. I cannot take my closed slates to Mr. Hermann and, without letting them out of my hand, receive a single word. But there are people I can take them to and hav them filled with interesting writing while kept entirely in my possession. Because Mr. J. M. Beall has never had such an experience, and cannot conceive of such a thing being done, he is not Liberal to throw mud at me, and say I am a liar or a fool. But to more fully show how thoroughly ignorant of the subject Mr. Beall is, when he says that a prestidigitator "can double discount that trick any day in the week," I wish to quote from Pschyische Studien for January, 1878, p. 43: "Robert Houdin, the great French conjurer, investigated the subject of clairvoyance with the sensitiv Alexis Didier. In the result he unreservedly admitted that what he had observed was wholly beyond the resources of his art to explain."

Samuel Bellachini, court conjurer at Berlin, signed a paper before a notary, Dec. 6, 1877, stating, after the minutest investigations of Mr. Slade's surroundings, "I hav not in the smallest degree found anything to be produced by means of prestidigitativ manifestations, and that any explanation of the experiments which took place under the circumstances and conditions then obtaining by any reference to prestidigitation, is absolutely impossible." And lastly, Mr. Hermann, in January, 1881, while performing in Chicago, visited Mrs. Simpson with a competent committee, Hermann having previously confidently assured all concerned that no writing would occur. And yet, under Hermann's own conditions, writing appeared on the slate, and Professor Hermann said he was satisfied that no living person could hav been in any contact with the pencil when it did the writing. And afterward Professor Hermann was offered $5,000 to produce by sleight-of-hand similar phenomena on slates, under the same conditions as those produced by Slade and Watkins, but he declined to try to earn the money. Comment is unnecessary.

Spiritualism may not be true, but it ill becomes one as thoroughly ignorant of the subjects he talks about, as Mr. Beall demonstrates he is, to accuse all readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER who claim to be Spiritualists, according to their present light, as not being "level-headed," while at the same time he claims to be a Liberalist. BALTIMORE, MD., Aug. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I send you another article on taxation contributed by me to the Baltimore Daily Record, published by the Maryland Law Journal Company. I am trying to do something toward making churches pay taxes. We are getting up a little excitement here in Baltimore on the subject, and as I hav used some of your thunder in this article I send it to you. Most people hav forgotten what Garfield, Grant, Jefferson, and others said, and we should keep it before the people, and publish over and over again. The Liberals are not so activ as they ought to be in the West, in the matter of forming the constitutions for these new states that are to be admitted. Thomas Jefferson's letter, which is here inclosed, should be published again and again; also the words of Grant, Garfield, and others. I inclose you the slip. It is Jefferson's last letter, and is addressed to R. C. Weightman, mayor of Washington. E. LIVEZEY.

MONTICELLO, June 24, 1826.

Respected Sir: The kind invitation I received from you on the part of the citizens of the city of Washington to be present with them at their celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of American independence, as one of the surviving signers of an instrument pregnant with our own and the fate of the world, is most flattering to myself, and hightened by the honorable accompaniment proposed for the comfort of such a journey. It adds sensibly to the sufferings of sickness to be deprived by it of a personal participation in the rejoicings of that day, but acquiescence is a duty . . . I should, indeed, with peculiar delight, hav met and exchanged these congratulations personally with the small band, the remnant of that number of those who joined with us on that day in the bold and doubtful election we were to make for our country, between submission and the sword; and to hav enjoyed with them the consolatory fact that our fellow-citizens, after half a century of experience and prosperity, continue to approve the choice we made. May it be to the world, what I believe it will be (to some parts sooner, to others later, but finally to all) the signal of arousing men to burst the chains under which monkish ignorance and superstition had persuaded them to bind themselvs, and to assume the blessings and security of self-government. The form which we hav substituted restores the free right to the unbounded exercise of reason and freedom of opinion. All eyes are opened or opening to the rights of man. The general spread of the lights of science has already laid open to every view the palpable truth that the mass of mankind has not been born with saddles on their backs, nor a favored few booted and spurred, ready to ride them legitimately, by the grace of God. These are grounds of hope for others—for ourselvs let the annual return of this day forever refresh our recollections of their rights and an undiminished devotion to them.

I will ask permission here to express the pleasure with which I should hav met my ancient neighbors of the city of Washington and its vicinities, with whom I passed so many years of a pleasing social intercourse—an intercourse which so much relieved the anxieties of the public cares, and left impressions so deeply engraved on my affections as never to be forgotten. With my regret that ill-health forbids me the gratification of an acceptance, be pleased to receive for yourself and those for whom you write the assurance of my highest respect and friendly attachment.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., Aug. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Modern science, especially evolution and the cognate branches of historical and biblical criticism, hav completely overthrown metaphysical theology. This fact is well known, not alone to scientific investigators, but also to scholarly theologians themselvs. And it is because of the conservatism of the learned—their lack of enthusiasm in radical change—that the institutions of religion, with their hypocrisy and roguery, are tolerated and indulged. But the innumerable writers after the style of Voltaire are making everything religious vulgar, by showing the emptiness of its claims to be supremely ridiculous. As likewise the multitude of authors after the style of Paine, Ingersoll, and Hugo, with their lucid common-sense arguments and keen sarcasm, are rapidly inspiring the whole mass of the people with a lively, enthusiastic sense of rational Freethought, which is everywhere undermining all religious institutions to their utter destruction; for when the Radical enthusiasm of the people becomes enlightened and aroused revolution is inevitable.

And the uniqueness of the wit and sarcasm of Mr. Heston's cartoons is an Archimedes lever in the razing of these gently-cunning—"dove and serpent"—but really debasing and swindling Christian institutions. His illustrated representations of their hypocrisy and roguery are at once and instantaneously—optically and mentally—captivating and demonstrativ in the highest degree.

Vulgar and ridiculous as here applied to theology and religion, will readily suggest the mathematical reductio ad absurdum as being interchangeable, for the import is similar.

The false delicacy shown by the unfriendly critics of these artistic illustrations, that they are coarse and offensiv to the finer sensibilities of some milk-and-water Liberals, and highly so to wavering, thoughtful Christians, is totally devoid of argument against their use as a powerful means in the demolition and utter destruction of ecclesiastic tyranny and sacerdotal assumption and domination.

A view of the terrible way the church and ministers of religion scourged heretics and independent thinkers in the past, and the efforts now being made by them to regain power to accomplish their will to do so again, should be sufficient for all Liberals to waive any adverse criticism of these striking, iconoclastic pictures; nay, rather they should be hailed with delight by all friends of progress as the most effectual means of drawing the attention of the wilfully blind and ignorant enemies of Rationalism, as likewise to renew the recollection of the joyful deliverance of the emancipated slaves of ecclesiasticism, who hav gained our freedom by laborious research and logical deduction.

Let the keen shafts of satire, sarcasm, and ridicule—literary and artistic—strike with their irresistible force, and thoroughly vulgarize, the genteel, fashionable sham of current Christianity, and no support of its "respectable" hypocrits can long shield it from merited popular contempt and general indignation and disgust.

Vive Heston! Vive le ridicule! J. F.

PORTSMOUTH, O., Aug. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Freethinkers, the real heroes of the world, are struggling with one of the most heartless organizations, the church, that this country can show forth. The distance between those who are contending for the right, who depend on the natural, may be great, still their hearts are as warm, their sympathies as abiding, as though they were standing side by side. No band of men has deserved more credit, since history was written, than the grand and growing columns who are battling for the liberty of man, woman, and child. Their heart is in the work and their work is to them the breath of life. The bright examples among them are counted by hundreds, and this of itself is sufficient to save their reputation and their all from sweeping condemnation, destruction, and death at the hands of that gigantic fraud, the pulpit, that power before which ignorance bows and crawls and receives the brand of an intellectual serf. On one hand is heard the crack of the whip and the click of the collar, while on the other ring out the silvery notes of freedom, the boasting sounds of those living to uphold truth, and to exert a moral influence over the children of men. Those laying claim to this latter high calling cannot help succeeding. They are gaining ground daily and the victory is bound to be theirs. They are on the side of right and justice, and to them be it said, in the words of the immortal Shakspere, "Thrice armed is he that hath his quarrel just."

I was rather amused yesterday at a trial before Squire Ashton, in which William Watkins, a highly religious shoemaker, was defendant. The charge written against Watkins was tha' of bastardy, the prosecuting witness being a Miss Thompson, a girl of nineteen summers, whom he had ruined by promises too numerous to mention. Watkins is a married man, and for several years has been a loud-mouthed, shouting Methodist. His first experience as a religious reformer was in the ranks of the Salvation Army, and came about in this way. One night he was in a Gallea avenue bar-room drinking and carousing. He forgot to square his saloon account—that is to say, tried to put it on the barkeeper's eye. The latter, a large-sized "Dutchman," made for Watkins with blood in his optic. Watkins stopped not to argue the question, and fled out the back entrance, over the fence, and never stopped until he had reached the inside of the Salvation Army barracks. The petticoats of the army smelled whisky on his breath, and at once seized him as a prisoner. From that on till the disbandment of the corps he thumped the tambourine and sang hallelujahs as loud and as long as the oldest veteran. The trial resulted in his being bound over to court in the sum of $300, and he is now turned the Solomon of the Methodists.

We have a sort of local Jesus in our midst in the form of Lorenzo Dow Ellis, who by occupation is a builder of wagons and pumps. He is a great freak, and claims to tell the past, the present, and the future by the touch. Several years ago he imagined he could heal disease by placing his hands upon the affected part or parts. He got Uncle Jimmy Feurt, who is the veteran Liberal of the section, to allow him to try to heal him, to cure him of his blindness and his rheumatism. Uncle Jimmy consented in order to prove that faith cure was a fraud. For one solid hour Ellis kept the old gentleman on his knees with nothing on save the attire of nature, and during this time danced and pawed around him like a madman. Finally Feurt raised up a-cussing, and put a stop to pow-wows and nonsensical incantations.

My friend, Mr. J. S. Trentheart, who is an able defender of Freethought, has informed me that the word "helpmeet," so often used in the garden of Eden story, means "help me eat." I accept this because there is common sense in it. WILL S. ANDRES.

PURDY'S STATION, N. Y., Aug. 13, 289.

MR. EDITOR: An insane man once complained that there is no sane person in the whole world. Being asked why he allowed insane people to hav unlimited freedom, he replied, "There are not asylums enough in the world to hold them all." It seems to me that this individual has many followers even among the reformers and Freethinkers. Many of them are convinced that everyone is wrong except themselvs, and they regret that they hav not power enough to run the world according to their fancy. It may be natural for a man to think that only his principles are right, but there is no reason why others who do not share his ideas should be abused. We often hear the charge that Freethinkers, in their arguments against what is called the Christian religion, use too strong language, and thus not only hurt the feelings of the Christians whom they try to enlighten, but even weaken the cause for which they so earnestly fight. They are requested to soften their colors a little. It cannot be denied that this charge is to a certain degree true. Some correspondents of our Freethought papers are not very particular about their words. They condemn bigotry in Christians, and yet they are bigoted themselvs; they mistake abuse for argument; they forget the splendid saying of Colonel Ingersoll, "I don't despise a man because he has the rheumatism, I despise the rheumatism because it has a man." All this is wrong. In a discussion personalities ought to be out of question. We should deal with principles, not with the persons who accept or reject certain principles. If our aim is to kill the monsters of superstition, we should wage war upon them, but not upon their victims. It is of no help to us to call other people fools and knaves, no matter what their beliefs may be. Whatever you may think of Talmage or Sam Jones, leave them alone, and deal with their utterances if they are worth replying to. We can afford to be kind to our fellow-men even if there is no point upon which we agree with them. True, many Christians are so intolerant that they deny to others the rights they claim for themselvs, and so bigoted that they regard a Freethinker as a monster. But shall we imitate them? Should we accept them as our tutors? If a Christian calls me an Infidel and a child of the devil, it does not follow that I must call him a fool and a rascal. True, it is a pitiful sight to see an intelligent and well-educated man believe in orthodox Christianity, with its heaven and hell, angels and devils. Still, let us hav charity; let us remember that he believes as he must, that for some reason or another he cannot rise above his surrounding. But at the same time we ought to be true to ourselvs. No compromise ought to be made. The truth, or what we believe to be the truth, should be told in plain and unmistakable language. Professor Huxley says that we cannot oblige our opponents and believe, or say that we believe, certain things which we can not believe, even if morality will be ruined on account of it.

The trouble is that many Christians consider their religion too sacred to be examined, and no matter how mild your language might be, you will always hurt their feelings. When Colonel Ingersoll asked of Dr. Field: "What do you think of Abraham? of Jephthah? what is your opinion of Jehovah himself?" the doctor didn't seem to be shocked at all—at least he did not say so. But the Right Hon. William Gladstone could not stand these simple questions, and he asks rather severely "whether this is the tone in which controversies ought to be carried on? Not only is the name of Jehovah encircled in the heart of every believer with the profoundest reverence and love, but the Christian religion teaches, through the incarnation, a doctrin of personal union with God so lofty that it can only be approached in a deep, reverential calm." If Mr. Gladstone is right, then religious controversies will become almost impossible. If, in order to examin the character of a God, you must be in a state of deep, reverential calm, you cannot giv your real opinion of him. If when you ask one, what does he think of a certain deity, you violate "the laws of social morality and decency," you can ask no question whatever with regard to the supposed deity. What should Colonel Ingersoll hav done? Was it his duty to appeal to Mr. Gladstone and ask him what language he should use when Jehovah is under consideration? Was it his duty to say: "Mr. Gladstone, will your honor be kind enough to tell me how shall I write about Jehovah without offending you and all Christians who share your reverence for Jehovah?"

Suppose Colonel Ingersoll had discussed English politics, and used the following language: "What do you think of John Bright? of William Gladstone? what is your opinion of Queen Victoria herself?" would Mr. Gladstone hav complained of having his feelings hurt? Would he hav asked "whether this is the tone in which political controversies ought to be carried on? Not only is the name of Victoria encircled in the heart of every Englishmenan with the profoundest reverence and love, but the English constitution teaches a doctrin of personal union with the queen so lofty that it can only be approached in a deep, reverential calm." Surely Mr. Gladstone would hav admitted that Colonel Ingersoll has an inalienable right to examin the character and conduct of the queen, and freely say what he thinks of her.

Suppose the Greek mythology had been the subject of the discussion, and Colonel Ingersoll had asked: "What do you think of Bacchus? of Venus? what is your opinion of Zeus himself?" would Mr. Gladstone hav accused him of violating the laws of social morality and decency? Why then should Jehovah be an exception? Is it because he is Mr. Gladstone's pet? Does Mr. Gladstone mean to say: "Hands off, leave my pet alone?"

What then is to be done? How are religious controversies to be carried on? Shall we stop denouncing error simply because the good Christians do not want to hav their minds disturbed? No; we should never fail to teach what we believe to be true, and to expose the mistakes and errors of the past. We are not bound to keep our mouths shut simply because some one cannot stand opposition to his religion. It is our duty to be kind to our adversaries. We should hav malice for none. Truth, however, should not suffer on account of it. Kindness and truth ought to go hand in hand. Colonel Ingersoll and Professor Huxley, in my opinion, happily combine both qualities. They are kind and candid; they avoid coarse language; they are charitable toward their opponents, even if the latter do not treat them kindly, but at the same time they are fearless and uncompromising. Their words are real representations of their thoughts, and for that reason are always valuable. Their example is worth following. Respectfully yours, CLEMENS P. BERYLSON.

DETROIT, MICH., July 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: There appears to be a three-cornered or triangular argument coming up between Mr. James, Mr. Barrett, and myself, which may be more profitable than Anarchy. I am often lost in astonishment at the want of common sense of reformers, who will waste their time and talents in silly quibbling about "what is money, and what it shall be made of, and who may or may not issue it." Mr. Barrett says that he heartily indorses my idea, and then shows that he does not in the least comprehend what I wrote. I certainly wish to hav government issue all of the money, and with it pay all government and all general public expenses, and never to authorize nor recognize anything else as money. Mr. Barrett does not seem to know anything about money, and until he takes the trouble to learn a little something about it he should not try to teach others, as he only confuses them. Money is the creation, the fiat, of the government, and the government in this country is claimed to be the people. Now, what sense can Mr. Barrett see in the people loaning money to the people at one per cent or any other per cent, and what can he mean by holding a paper dollar at par, since nothing is money but that which government stamps as a legal tender in payment of debts, and no money (lawful money) ever depreciated one mill. Bank bills are not money. They can only exist by fraud, and can only circulate by the withdrawal and destruction of money. There is no other illegal, unlawful, barefaced fraud and robbery that ever existed on earth so damnable as that of the withholding from the people of real money, and by taxation compelling them to borrow bankers' debts to pay taxes, debts, and interest with. Out of this slavish fraud, as its natural fruit, come poverty, war, murder, vice, crime, and every evil known to humanity.

And Mr. C. L. James is just as far off and just as illogical as Mr. Barrett. Mr. James proposes mutual banking. Of course, the expenses of mutual banking must come from interest. As interest is a useless wrong, so banking, of any kind, name, or nature, is wrong. Mr. James advocates just the same kind of fraud as that which, from 1830 to 1860, was called wildcat. He says that the great trouble with the wild cat banks was that they were required by law to redeem, not in value, but in specie, a certain kind of value, and he says very much the same is the trouble with the representativ money issued by governments. Now, this is very silly talk, with not a particle of truth in either statement. The real trouble with the wildcat bank paper was that it was not money, but a fraud upon the people, who were childish fools to ever be so blind. There is no power that can make either wildcat, national bank, or mutual bank paper, money, and honest reformers should, by all means, learn this fact and cease to help the money-lending robbers to delude the people. Nothing is money but that which is issued by the government. Anyone who has read the Constitution of the United States ought to know this, and Mr. James ought also to know that Russia and Austria hav no money, never had any; they borrow and use bankers' debts even for the use of government expenses, while the government of this country makes an imitation of money and givs it to the enemies of the people to be called money, and then levies taxes to the extent of nearly eight hundred millions a year, thus compelling the people to borrow a wildcat imitation of money to pay taxes with. Mr. James's assertion that government money ever depreciated is untrue, and he cannot point to an instance when legal tender money ever depreciated. Nor that its value ever rests upon its volume. It seems almost a hopeless enterprise to labor for better opportunities for the people while the ones who claim to know how to help them make such glaringly false statements. The want of money is the true and only cause of the poverty, slavery, war, vice, crime, and suffering all over the world to-day, and yet Mr. James will use his influence to disparage the issue of money and in favor of a false banking wildcat fraud, with the continuance of the vampire interest.

I hav before me the speech of Senator Z. Chandler, in the United States Senate, Feb. 18, 1874, upon the increase of national bank circulation and redemption of three per cent loan. This great head of the Republican savior of the republic, on this occasion, said: "In 1865 I advocated, on this floor, the substitution of bank notes for greenbacks, as a step toward the resumption of specie payments." There was never any greater traitor to the people of this country than the man who advocated the substitution of bank bills for real money in circulation, and no more false, lying traitors then lived than were then in the Congress of this nation. And, perhaps, in no other way has religion ever done more harm than in its support of every falsehood put forth by the money-lenders to delude the people as to the name, the nature, and the functions of money. Common sense has scarcely ever been used in the examination of the question. If the simple truth had been plainly stated, that money is the creation of law for the payment of debts, the world would look ever so much brighter to nine-tenths of its people.

A little book is before me, published by G. B. DeBernard Sedalia, Mo., in which I find the truth stated more plain and emphatic than ever before. He says: "Giv us money and without fear of overproduction we will employ every man and woman at remunerativ wages. . . . Giv us money, and we will put an end forever to the contest now raging between capital and labor."

Giv us money, and nothing more will ever be heard of monopolies, of high and low tariff, of high and low wages. Nor of strikes nor lock-outs, nor boycotts nor hard times, nor panics, nor financial crises, nor famin, nor distress, nor poverty, nor riots and revolutions. Scarcity of money is the cause of all these. Giv us money, and universal prosperity will follow.

Every man of ordinary intelligence not only believes, but positivly knows, the above assertions and possibilities to be correct. He knows that with money he could liberate every family now groaning under mortgage. He could drive the wolf from every door, wipe out from every heart the dread of poverty, with its attendant evils, and fill every home with abundance and enjoyment.

"Thus," says he, "it is plain that the great problem of labor, nay, the still greater problem of human development, human liberty, and human happiness on earth, depend upon the free circulation of money."

Upon money, therefore, we insist, should concentrate all the attention, all the study, all the intelligence, and all the mental and material forces of organized labor in all countries.

Let me hope that my friends and fellow-laborers, Barrett and James, will take the trouble and use the patience to study and think of these truths, for truly they are the foundation of the liberty which we all seek for, and the only way we can hope for success lies in the question of free money, and the absolute abolition of all debt and interest.

Ever for liberty for all, J. H. WOOD.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

" Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

How the Ransom Was Paid.

On the helpless Flemish village
Cruel Alva swooped and fell,
And the peace of trade and tillage
Turned to martial clank and yell.
the town-house, tall and handsome,
Stood the great duke, looking down
On the burghers proffering ransom
For the safety of the town.

O'er his brow gray locks were twining—
For his casque was laid aside,
And his good sword carved and shining
From his sword-belt was untied.
Prince he seemed of born commanders,
Pride and power each gesture told,
As he cried, "Ye men of Flanders,
Bring me twenty casks of gold!"

Then upon them fell a sadness,
And a shadow like a pall,
While they murmured, "'Tis rank madness
Such a sum from us to call."
And the spokesman of the village
Murmured feebly, "Sure you jest."
Answered Alva, "Gold or pillage—
Choose whiche'er may suit you best."

Faint and stunned, they turned despairing,
When arose a laugh of joy—
And before their startled staring
In there pranced a little boy.
On his curls the duke's helm rested,
As his noisy glee he roared,
And his good steed mailed and crested
Was great Alva's mighty sword!

Round about the room he gamboled,
Peeping through the helmet bars;
Now he leaped and now he ambled—
Like a Cupid mocking Mars.
Then he stayed his merry prancing
And of Alva's knees caught hold,
Where a ray of sunlight glancing
Turned his sunny curls to gold.

Swift the mother, sorely frightened,
Strove to take the cherub wild,
But the duke's stern features lightened
As he kept her from the child,
And he drank the pretty prattle—
For the baby knew no fear,
Till his eye, so fierce in battle,
Softened with a pearly tear.

For a baby rose before him
In fair Spain, ere war's alarms—
Thus his father's sword upbore him—
Alva caught the boy in arms,
And, the pretty forehead baring,
Cried, "A kiss!"—the child obeyed.
Then unto those men despairing
Alva said, "Your ransom's paid!"

Concerning Boys.

A charming book is "Prose Pastorals," by Herbert M. Sylvester. In it he truly discourses of boys as follows:

Too many boys come up without realizing that they ever had any boyhood at all, and with the boy on the farm it is senseless folly on the part of the parent that he is looked upon as something that should be made to pay its way. Boys are not machines, but they are too often treated as if they were. Boys hav no sense of fitness, and are often unreasonable in their likes and dislikes, but they are only boys, as various-minded as a weathercock, and as breezy and boisterous as a March wind. There is abundant time to build them into men without their being dwarfed by any strait-jacket of Puritan austerity, or by an arid, desert-like existence of an "all-work-and-no-play" childhood—a plan of building by which many a boyhood has been made most miserable when it should hav been a succession of halcyon days to be remembered with pleasure, and to be looked back to with the single regret that they had not lasted longer.

Daisies and Buttercups.

Pillus, for so she is known to kinsfolk and acquaintances, though in the baptismal register she is entered Phyllis, had strayed into Farmer May's meadow. It is a special favorit with children, this grassy, oak-bordered pasture land, and, indeed, the daisies which grow there are quite the reddest I hav ever seen! Pillus was very busy picking buttercups and daisies. I watched her from over the hedge. She had set her doll up against a big oak-tree, and was chattering to it gravely as she made up a posy. Suddenly she caught sight of "Jack," Farmer May's fox-terrier, lying huddled in a heap on the sunny side of the cow-shed. The dog looked ill, a mere bag of bones, and to-day he was quite unable to get up and enjoy a game with Pillus. Instinctivly she knew this, and, running forward, she was soon kneeling by his side, talking to him in the same grave fashion as she had conversed with dolly. Jack did his best to show his appreciation of her sympathy. He shook his tail feebly, his whole body quivered, he whined and licked her hand. In a little while Pillus left the dog's side, and, running down the field path, she clambered over the stile and disappeared from my sight. I might hav thought she had gone home to dinner had I not noticed that the doll still sat, stiff and stark, under the great oak tree. So not many minutes had elapsed before I caught sight of the child again clambering back into the field. She had been running hard, she looked hot and flushed, and her hat had fallen back upon her shoulders. She was carrying something very carefully, which, as she neared me, I discovered to be a small white mug. Afterward, on close inspection, I found the mug was adorned with a landscape in vivid blue and greens, and inscribed with the legend, "A present for a good girl." It was evidently a choice article. The next thing Pillus did was to arrange a bunch of flowers in the mug. This was by no means a short operation. It necessitated much deliberation, together with a good deal of grave conversation addressed to Jack. When the bouquet was arranged to her complete satisfaction, she set the mug down just in front of the sick dog, saying: "I said I'd giv them all to you, Jackie, dear! Aren't they sweet?" and with that she left him.—London Queen.

What a Boy Knows About Feet.

What I no about feet is lots. I hav got a pare that has been with me for some time, & I must say I am vary much attached to them, and I beleeve they think jest as much of me. Feet is born onto you down below near your ankle, but you cant help that, an besides if they was on your elboes or your nees or other spots on your purson you would haf to walk awkwork. Feet is flat, oblong bunches on the bottom of your legs. They are composed of insteps & skin & heals and souls & toes whitch is fastened on with nails. I don't supose thare is anything in the world that carries about with it all the time so much meanness & sin and missary and hapyness as feet. Feet on boys is no good, anyway. Pa says they are only for to wear out shoes, but I wish he wasn't such a kicker.

Most everything you can think of has feet, but a river's foot is the funniest of all for its foot is in its mouth. But tables has feet, and so does beds—two kinds—the foot of the bed & the feet they stand on—& stands & hills and sewing machines & cats & other animals. But cats' feet is pause with scratchers into them, and so is dogs'; but horses' feet is hoofs, and mule's is lightning. The foot of a tree is roots, but the foot of a class is where you most generally find me. CHARLIE.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

There is a two-year-old boy in Kingston who has an especial fondness for the society of his mother. The other day he stood at the foot of the stairs calling, "Mamma, mamma!" Finally the mother inquired: "Does baby want mamma?" The answer came back: "Baby wants mamma always."

A youngster of the female sex had just commenced her school life. She found herself one day in a little group of other schoolchildren who were further advanced than she was. They were telling each other what books they were "in" in school, and making as much as they could out of the subject. She could not stand it. Even to her infantil mind the meaner position she held in that company was clear. But she did not mean to be quite out of the discussion. So she took advantage of a pause in the talk and burst in with her list: "I'm in a primer and a slate and a pencil and sponge!"

A little six-year-old granddaughter of a well-known New England clergyman, in doubting a statement by her uncle that the moon is made of green cheese, was advised by the divine to ascertain for herself. "How can I, grandpa?" "Get your Bible and see what it says." "Where shall I begin?" "Begin at the beginning." The child sat down to read the Bible. Before she had got half through the second chapter of Genesis and had read about the creation of the stars and the animals, she came back to her grandfather, her eyes all bright with the excitement of discovery: "I've found it, grandpa! It isn't true, for God made the moon before he made any cows."

"Why don't you speak to him, Johnny? He wishes to make friends with you." "He ain't a boy, he's a girl," said Johnny, as he moved farther from the little midget who was sidling up to him and who in dress was the very counterpart of himself. "Girls look just the same as a boy, but she ain't. Boys don't push up to a feller as girls do. Girls ain't got no sense, pushing up and talking to a fellow they don't know."

Little Julia is in the habit of saying "Amen" to the grace her papa asks at table, and she usually says it heartily and with unction. But she failed to say it altogether at breakfast a few mornings ago, and sat gloomily at the table, which had rather less on it than usual, and nothing that Julia liked. Some one at the table asked why Julia was silent. "Puh," she said with a fine scorn, "I don't think I'll say amen for such a breakfast as this."

A few mornings since at breakfast, in a rich Clifton home, a little tot paralyzed his maternal progenitor by exclaiming: "Mamma, I love you better than I love oatmeal." "Do you love that much, dear?" was the tender rejoinder. "Well, I ain't stuck on it."

A little Boston boy, aged six, is of a very imaginativ temperament. Quite recently his mother noticed that at bedtime each night he laid his little boots together upon their sides, instead of setting them upright. "Pray tell me why you always place your boots that way?" said mamma, and the child replied: "Because they must be tired walking so much all day I lay them sideways so that they can rest."

Correspondence.

ST. JOSEPH, MICH., Aug. 12, 1889.

MISS SUSAN H. WIXON: You will please pardon me for intruding on the "fold of the Children's Corner," but I think that perhaps the subject inclosed may be desired for your use in THE TRUTH SEEKER, as I think it rather instructiv to both old and young, being a new branch of domestic culture, and if you wish to arrange the manuscripts in such shape for printing as may suit your fancy, and for the best use to your school of boys and girls, you are at liberty so to do; if not, to pass it in with the "obnoxious weeds" of the editor's basket. I am a little boy fifty-one years of age, and while quite old for a boy, I am still a boy in the true family of truth seekers, and while I am seeking all the light from others that is shed for me, I am ever willing to donate my fragmentary bits to those who may wish them, and I am only sorry that I hav not the talent of an Ingersoll or Spencer that I might do more good in the cause that is the dearest to me of all others.

Very respectfully, A. D. SWAN.

Frogs.

MISS WIXON: As I am a lover of all good boys and girls, and especially those who are being raised under your advice and the influence of that best of all Liberal papers, THE TRUTH SEEKER, I wish to talk to them a little of the culture of domesticated frogs, as I am sure that but few of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER know that our common bullfrog has ever been domesticated, that is, been raised like geese, ducks, chickens, etc., under the care and protection of man. At St. Joseph, Mich., a rather antiquated but beautiful little summer resort, on the east coast of Lake Michigan, at the mouth of the St. Joe river, sixty miles east by north 8° from the great city of Chicago, reside Messrs. Stevens & Swan, proprietors of a nice little frog farm, inclosed within a high board fence, supposed to be hog, dog, snake, and turtle tight, in which are three nice little artificial ponds, made for the purpose of raising frogs, nothing but an improved kind of the common bullfrog, and there may now be seen hundreds of thousands of frogs of all sizes, ages, and colors, which hav all come from a few dozen, well selected in size, color, and proportions, bought at big prices, and placed in these ponds last spring. The little froggies, although your children would say they are not frogs, as they hav no legs at all but instead hav a tail which grown-up frogs never hav, yet are real frogs but not fully developed, and are called pollywogs (see dictionary), and when a little older are called tadpoles, and when still larger grown their tail disappears and they hav four legs, and are then real frogs. All these come from the "spawn" or eggs of the mother frogs, and when first laid float on top of the water in clusters of many hundreds, each the size of a pin-head and quite black, which is soon hatched by the hot sun, and they then sink, and while they look like little black beans on the bottom of the water, they will move very rapidly if touched. After this there is soon seen little tails attached to them and they are then called pollywogs or pollywiggles. These little, tiny creatures need none of man's assistance or a mother's care, but seem to "liv and grow fat" off the mud and water. Not so with Mr. and Mrs. Frog, as they seem much inclined to eat everything in their reach, water-bugs, flies, crabs, and even small snakes if one happens to find his way into froggy's domicil, and, what is worse, they are the naughtiest of parents, for when hungry they are cannibalistic, and, like fish, will eat each other. To remedy such naughty behavior in the old frogs and to protect the younger "'wogs and tads," the owners hav to feed them every day with some kind of fresh meat, liver, etc. This is done by tying long slender strips of flesh to the end of a pole or holding them in the tips of the fingers where they are sure to attract the attention of every frog in sight, and such a scrambling and jumping is a wonder to behold, many frogs jumping a foot or more from the water to get the tempting red, worm-like meat. Besides the care of feeding, certain mosses, bogs, and spatterdock must be planted in the home of the frogs to make them thrive, and from these they derive much of their subsistence. The owners hav already learned to know certain ones that hav become so tame that even strangers can pat them on their heads, and different names hav been given them after some peculiarity of size, color, or shape. One very large one is called John L. Sullivan and, like the pugilist after whom he is named, he seems to hav more muscle power than manly sense. It is expected that all of the now tiny little "'wogs and tads" will be big enough for market in one year, and many will be caught before Jack Frost puts a stop to their evening concerts, and will be stored away in warm winter quarters, to be shipped to the great cities in mid-winter to tickle the epicurean palates of those who think enough of the delicate white meat of froggy's hind legs to pay several dollars per dozen for them. I am sure none of your little boys or girls would wish to open their banks and pay such a price from their "long-in-saving" store of pennies for such frail-looking hindquarters, and I hope that each one can hav everything else of the "goodies" of the table and will not wish the toothsome froggies' hind legs. The frogs will soon become very tame and come at the call of their attendant, and won't it then be fun to see them jumping, croaking, and hurrying from all directions, like little chicks in the morning when they hear the "Cluck, cluck, cluck," of the little boy or girl on the farm or at the hennery, whose call they hav learned and from whom they obtain their morning repast? THE STRUGGLE
FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

Buddhist Morality.

From the Buddhist, Colombo, Ceylon.

Thought in the mind hath made us. What we are
By thought was wrought and built. If a man's mind
Hath evil thoughts, pain comes on him as comes
The wheel the ox behind.

All that we are is what we thought and willed;
Our thoughts shape us and frame. If one endure
In purity of thought joy follows him
As his own shadow sure.

"He hath defamed me, wronged me, injured me,
Abased me, beaten me!" If one should keep Thoughts like these angry words within his breast,
Hatreds will never sleep.

"He hath defamed me, wronged me, injured me,
Abased me, beaten me!" If one shall send
Such angry words away for pardoning thoughts,
Hatreds will hav an end.

For never anywhere at any time
Did hatred cease by hatred. Always 'tis
By love that hatred ceases, only love:
The ancient law is this.

The many, who are foolish, hav forgot,
Or never knew, how mortal wrongs pass by:
But they who know and who remember, let
Transient quarrels die.

Whoso abides, looking for joy, unschooled,
Gluttonous, weak, in idle luxuries,
Mara will overthrow him, as fierce winds
Level short-rooted trees.

Whoso abides, disowning joys, controled,
Temperate, faithful, strong, shunning all ill,
Mara shall no more overthrow that man
Than the wind doth a hill.

Whoso Kashya wears, the yellow robe,
Being anitkashya, not sin-free,
Nor heeding truth and governance; unfit
To wear that dress is he.

But whoso, being nishkashya, pure,
Clean from offense, doth still in virtues dwell,
Regarding temperance and truth, that man
Weareth Kashya well.

Whoso imagins truth in the untrue,
And in the true finds untruth, he expires
Never attaining knowledge; life is waste;
He follows vain desires.

Whoso discerns in truth the true, and sees
The false in falseness with unblinded eye,
He shall attain to knowledge; life with such
Aims well before it die.

As rain breaks through an ill-thatched roof, so break
Passions through minds that holy thought depise;
As rain runs from a perfect thatch, so run
Passions from off the wise.

The evildoer mourneth in this world,
And mourneth in the world to come; in both
He grieveth. When he sees fruits of his deeds
To see he will be loath.

The righteous man rejoiceth in this world
And in the world to come; in both he takes Pleasure. When he shall see fruit of his works
The good sight gladness makes.

Glad is he living, glad in dying, glad
Having once died; glad always, glad to know
What good deeds he hath done, glad to foresee
More good where he shall go.

The lawless man, who, not obeying law,
Leaf after leaf recites, and line by line,
No Buddhist is he, but a foolish herd
Who counts another's kine.

The law-obeying, loving one, who knows
Only one verse of Dharma, but hath ceased
From envy, hatred, malice, foolishness,
He is the Buddhist Priest.

London, May 14th. EDWIN ARNOLD.

An Acrostic.

From the Protestant Standard, Sydney, Aus.

Let no false mercy aid sedition's cause;
A rebel never will submit to laws.
Papist and loyal! Answer me the thing;
Hav serpents gratitude? An asp no sting?
Sway is his aim, and power without control,
And persecution fires his guilty soul;
His thoughts by factious actions are disclosed,
King, law, and government alike opposed.
He'll swear he's loyal and within an hour
Betray his country to a hostil power.
Bind him with oaths; oaths hav no strength to bind
Him who a priest has sovereign of his mind.
Fast held in bigot's zeal, his jaundiced eye
In every Protestant a foe'll descry.
A fixed aversion, and determined hate,
Chain, fire, and halter, heretics await.
He first can swear, forswear, then be absolved,
Is only to be trusted when involved;
Faithful alone in Protestants' damnation,
Again to bring in transubstantiation.

After the Eviction;

OR, LOVE IN THE OPEN.

Adam. Thunder! what's that, you Eve? —that hump upon your back, which was not so before? You look, for all the world—I'm blest 'f you don't—like a dromedary sent into this breathing world scarce half made-up.

Eve. Now you just stop! I won't hav you talking to me like that, you Adam. That hump, as you call it, is a bustle, you old ninny. I'm going to brace up and hav some style about me, even if I don't liv in the garden now, and this coat nothing but hedgehog skin—why couldn't he made us—me, at least—seal-skin sacks? A coat of hedgehog skin, not even on a bias cut—the idea! No trimming, no nothing—faugh! it's ridiculous! But, now you know what that "hump" is, as you call it, let me ask you a question, old man.

Adam. Propound, dearest. I'm all ears.

Eve. Humph! All ears. Yes, I've often thought so. If you only had the skin, ridiculous tail, and didn't stand up on your hind legs, you would make a first-class——

Adam. Eve! Don't try my good nature too severely. I move the previous question, madam.

Eve. Well, what I want to know is, how long we are going to trapse about the country in this fashion, without a place to lay our heads under cover, and living on pignuts and persimmons—we, the first family of Eden, and progenitors of the coming four hundred? That's what I want to know, you Adam.

Adam. What can we do? I'm blest 'f I know what's to be done.

Eve. Do? Well, in the first place, why don't you build a house? I can't giv birth to four children in the open, like the beasts do, and then settle down to farming. Plant corn, potatoes, pickles, watermelons, etc. Sell what we can't eat for drygoods and groceries. I must hav drygoods, or I shall hav conniptions.

Adam. Hold your horses, old gal.

Eve. You Adam, you stop! Don't you dare to call me old gal. I'm the youngest woman on earth, and that's a-saying a good deal, and I ain't in my teens yet.

Adam. Oh, I don't mean anything, Eve. But, see here, how can I build a house, and nary a saw, hammer, or other tool to build with? Besides, where 'm I to get the nails? And you'll want carpets, Japanese screens, portières, and things. and where are you going to get 'em? Do be reasonable, Eve.

Eve. Well, you might knock up a hut of boughs without hammer and nails, and that would beat no house all to pieces. Then you could go to work and plant corn and things.

Adam. What hav I got to do farming with? Where's the steam plow, the steam mower——

Eve. Steam fiddlesticks! Plow with a stick, and plant wild corn, potatoes, and things. Cultivation will tame 'em down to better suit our taste, probably.

Adam. I don't know about that. You know the book says: "As ye sow so shall ye reap." If we sow wild corn and potatoes, we're not going to reap tame ones, you bet!

Eve. I see it all, you man. You don't want to work when you can trapse about and liv on wild things. There's only one thing you'd care to sow, and that's wild oats, but let me catch you, that's all! It wouldn't be funny for you, a little bit, to come in singing, "As I Go Rolling Home," "We Won't Go Home till Morning," "O Landlord, Fill Your Flowing Bowl," "A Little More Cider, Too," or any of them wild-oats songs—not a little bit funny, and don't you forget it!

Adam. Oh, come off, now. I've no idea of doing anything of the kind. I believe I am a respectable and self-respecting gentleman, madam, even though dispossessed and thrown on the cold, cold world.

Eve. Well, I hope you'll keep so. But now, do go to work and get up that bough hut, that's a good Ad. I declare, it isn't even love in a cottage with us, but love in the open, and do, for mercy's sake, let it be love in a bough hut, if nothing better—we'll call it our bower.

Adam. It was love in the garden where everything was lovely, and the goose altitudinously suspended, Eve, before you ate that damned—excuse me—that infernal apple.

Eve. Forever harping on that apple. For mercy's sake, do giv us a rest. As I told you the first day out, I'm glad I ate it, there, now! But I ain't a-going to speak to you again all day for mentioning that apple. I'm mad with you!

[Switches round to the other side of the tree, under which they were sitting, and, with her back against it, sulks and chews gum most industriously until the day is spent, never saying a word—well, hardly ever—except to shoot off sarcasms every now and then at her lord and master, to keep her tongue from rusting, as it were.] SI SLOKUM.

Religion Not Morals.

From the Western American.

The Romish writers and priests are busy impressing upon the public the fact that morals and religion are the same. Their object is evident; they wish to belie the evidence that confronts all who inquire into this question.

It is notorious that the nations that hav the most religion hav the least morals, that the nations who hav the most religion are the most unsafe for travelers. Take Spain, a nation that has more religion to the square mile than almost any nation on earth, yet is the home of brigands, robbers, bull-fighters, murderers, illegitimate children, and Roman priests, monks, and nuns.

The Roman machine, with its pagan hordes, has been a thousand years punching religion into the state and people of that unfortunate land. The result is ignorance, crime, poverty, superstition, and bastards for the people, while for princes and priests there is wealth, ease, luxury, and power over the masses. The papal states hav had considerable religion pumped into them, but as for morals, they are unable to make a showing that would suit a high caste Brahman. Again, the south of Ireland hav had religion crammed into them for centuries, until they are too religious to earn a peaceful living in their nativ land, yet their religion fails to keep them out of the hands of the police or from entering the penitentiary. The Irish of Ulster, who hav less religion but more morals, manage to avoid the police, and it is rarely one of them is convicted of crime.

This attempt to confound religion and morals is done for a purpose, mainly that priests may liv luxuriously, hav a "pull" in politics, and impose upon the American people. The history of the world shows that in all ages there hav been systems or men who lived by peddling superstition, receiving in return the coin of the realm, and these are the men who are always mixing religion and morals, and their success is equaled by the ignorance they can inflict upon a people.

Religion is defined to be a man's relation to his God, his faith or belief, and some religions involve a code of morals that is productiv of morals or good men. Then there are other religions that do not make men better, do not influence them to do right in their dealings with other men. The savages of Africa hav much religion of their kind, the Druids furnish plenty of religion, so the Aztecs, but no writer of modern times has given them much credit for morals.

The Roman religion furnishes in Chicago plenty of murders, in fact nearly all under indictment for that crime to-day in Cook County, are full of Romish religion. So with other crimes. They are nearly all graduates of parochial schools, or two hundred years of African slavery, while the graduates of our "godless" public schools are conspicuous by their freedom from crime and regard for law and order.

The persistent effort being made by Romish writers on the muzzled press to mislead the public deserves rebuke, and it is time this sort of aid they are giving a foreign corporation in its efforts to destroy our public schools should be shown in its true colors, and loyal Americans prepared to combat these Jesuitical enemies of light and intelligence.

Social Changes in New England.

From the New York Times.

It is nothing new to say that the Irish and French are rapidly filling up the two extremes in New England communities, the vacant farms in the back towns, and the fields of labor in the manufacturing centers; but as yet little has been said about the social changes which this access of alien races is producing in that part of the country. A metropolis like New York takes in everything and holds its population without much assimilation, but a section like New England, whose population has always had a distinct character, if entered upon by alien races who come to stay, is sure in a generation or two to be powerfully influenced by the new people. It is just this social change which is beginning to mark the more remote towns and to show itself in the manufacturing districts. The Irish immigration has been so extensiv since 1850 in cities like Boston, Lowell, Fall River, Springfield, Providence, and New Haven, that, if these races do not hav a majority of votes in these cities to-day they are almost sure to hav it to-morrow, and in the remote towns, where the American population has been drawn away to the cities, the Irish-Americans or the French Canadians represent the sturdy farmers of fifty years ago, and are repeating the process from wheelbarrow to chariot which the last two or three generations of enterprising New Englanders hav passed through. In the middling towns or cities the racial transformation is not so marked, but where the agricultural or the manufacturing interests hav chiefly prevailed the foreign element is largest and is rapidly working its way to a higher social position and to local or municipal control. What appears to-day here and there as the coming forward of the Irish-American element will soon be increased many fold, and the balance of social power, in at least a part of New England, will not be in the hands of the old residents. The scepter is departing from them to-day, and the newer social elements hav developed to that point where they must be reckoned with.

The social changes here noted are religious, political, and economic. The French and Irish, if not cordial on blood lines, are at one in their religious sympathies. They are in the same church and are under the same religious policy. They equally believe in the parochial school; they are committed to the ascendency of the Roman church; they are alike people of remarkable fecundity; they hang together well, and they are utterly opposed to the old religious traditions of New England. The Irish-Americans hav lived long enough in New England, however, to catch the spirit of our political institutions, even if they are opposed to the Protestant faith. But their own religious precedents are strongly ingrained and represent their positiv convictions, and it is here that the antagonism of the old and the new is most to be noted. Again, the social as distinct from the political development is entirely different. Here the race traditions come in, and the Irishman can no more forget the shamrock than the Puritan his hatred of "popery." In this light the Puritan life must dwindle in New England more and more, and the Celtic thought and language and tradition must take its place. The same is to be said of the French Canadians. At first they came to the states to remain long enough to earn money to buy a farm in Canada, but the national spirit has been broken, and small settlements of French Canadians are now very common all through rural New England, while in the mill districts the French are driving out the Irish, as the Irish a generation ago drove out the Yankees and are now trying to drive out the English. These Canadians are clannish and less inclined to become American citizens than either the English or the Irish, but they are industrious, frugal, light-hearted, and with better education will make valuable citizens. Their relativ increase is probably twice as rapid as that of the nativ New Englanders, and it will be seen from a study of the distribution of these people through the New England states that they are intrenching themselvs where in the near future they are sure to be a power that must be reckoned with.

Two inferences are to be drawn from these social changes. One is that within a few years the Roman Catholics will be in a position to demand legislation in the interests of religion and education which is specially favorable to themselvs. They will be asking that the parochial schools now being established under their own auspices shall be recognized by the state and supported out of the state funds. The Roman clergy are not slow to push their interests in other parts of the country when they are strong enough to do so, and there is no reason to believe that they will adopt a different method in New England. What they are coming to there is the holding of the balance of power in their own hands, and there is more likelihood that New England will be a Roman Catholic province in the next fifty years than that its Protestant religious and social traditions will be maintained as they are held to-day. Another inference is that the social, educational, economic, and provincial tone of New England will disappear. The first step to this was noted in the appointments for the dedication of the Plymouth monument, and a close observer will detect the trend in this direction in ways which are less marked. Either provincial New England will lose its distinctiv character in broader affiliations of the national life, or the local traditions will be absorbed in the French or Irish ascendency, and these people will hav their race characteristics modified by American ideas. Under any circumstances changes are imminent in New England which will be more radical and will hav more to do with changing the character of New England communities than any which hav taken place since the settlement of the country.

Gems of Thought.

AFTER the birth of Protestantism, it could not be admitted by the leaders of the Reformation that the Catholic church still had the power of working miracles. If the Catholic church was still in partnership with God, what excuse could hav been made for the Reformation? The Protestants took the ground that the age of miracles had passed. This was to justify the new faith. But Protestants could not say that miracles had never been performed, because that would take the foundation not only from the Catholics, but from themselvs; consequently, they were compelled to admit that miracles were performed in the apostolic days, but to insist that in their time man must rely upon the facts in nature. Protestants were compelled to carry on two kinds of war; they had to contend with those who insisted that miracles had never been performed; and in that argument they were forced to insist upon the necessity for miracles, on the probability that they were performed, and upon the truthfulness of the apostles. A moment afterward they had to answer those who contended that miracles were performed at that time; then they brought forward against the Catholics the same arguments that their first opponents had brought against them.—Ingersoll.

MEN marvel at the absurdity of other people's tenets, while exactly parallel absurdities remain in their own.—Westminster Review.

IF this religion must hav an influence on the happiness of men in this world and the next, there is no affair of more lively interest, nor which consequently demands a more mature examination. Can anything then be more strange than the conduct adopted by the greater part of mankind? Though perfectly convinced of the necessity of religion, and of its importance, yet never do they giv themselvs the trouble to examin it; they observe it from custom and habit; they never account to themselvs for its dogmas; they revere it, they submit to it, and groan under its burthen, without asking themselvs why they do so. In short, they hav recourse to others to examin for them, and those in whose judgment they put such blind trust, are precisely the persons whose decisions they ought to regard with suspicion. Priests hav the right to judge exclusivly, and without any appeal, the merits of a system evidently invented for their own emolument.—D'Holbach.

THE idea that God is a being of virtue and of love has not been attained even in the present day except by a cultivated few. Such is the frailty of the human heart, that men, even when they strive to imagin a perfect being, stain him with their passions, and raise up an idol which is defectiv as a moral form. The God of this country is called a God of love; but it is said that he punishes the crimes and even the errors of a short and troubled life with torture which will hav no end. It is not even a man which theologians create, for no man is quite without pity; no man, however cruel he might be, could bear to gaze forever on the horrors of the fire and the rack; no man could listen forever to voices shrieking with pain, and ever crying out for mercy and forgivness. And if such is the character of the Christian God, if such is the idea that is worshiped by compassionate and cultivated men, what are we to expect in a barbarous age? The Jehovah of the Pentateuch was a murderer and bandit; he rejoiced in offerings of human flesh. The gods of Homer were lascivious and depraved. The gods of savages are merely savage chiefs. God, therefore, is an image of the mind, and that image is ennobled and purified from generation to generation as the mind becomes more noble and more pure. Europeans believe in eternal punishment, partly because it has been taught them in their childhood and because they hav never considered what it means; partly because their imaginations are sluggish, and they are unable to realize its cruelty; and partly also, it must be feared, because they hav still the spirit of revenge and persecution in their hearts.—Winwood Reade.

How do you explain the fact that while Jehovah was waging wars of extermination, establishing slavery, and persecuting for opinions' sake, heathen philosophers were teaching that all men are brothers, equally entitled to liberty and life? You insist that Jehovah believed in slavery and yet punished the Egyptians for enslaving the Jews. Was your God once an abolitionist? Did he at that time "denounce Christ for not agreeing with him?"—Ingersoll.

ONE of the youngsters who was fond of Bible stories swallowed a bottle of paregoric because it was nice. They gave him a powerful emetic, and he described the sequel to his brother: "Budgie, I was a whay-al, a regular whay-al. I didn't fror up Jonah, but I frew up lots of uver tings."

A LITTLE miss, writing to her father on the first day of her entrance at boarding-school, says: "The first evening we had prayers, and then singing, and a passing round of bread, which I did not take, because, not being confirmed, I thought I had no right to take communion. Afterward I learned that I had lost my supper."

THE Bible affords a text for almost any condition of mind. The boy who had had a slight difficulty with a school-fellow, and who as a punishment was condemned to learn a passage of scripture, chose the following: "Blessed be the Lord, my strength, which teaches my hands to war and my fingers to fight." Older children are just as apt in discovering texts which suit their purposes.

MINISTERS will hav their little jokes like other people. "Come over and preach for me to-night," said a Chicago divine to a clerical friend whom he met on the street not many days since. "I can't to-night," was the reply. "I'm almost down sick with a headache." "Well," drolly observed the other, "I guess you can do it, for if you preach as you usually do, you won't hav to use your head." Then they both laughed and punched each other in the ribs, and said it was a good one, just as heartily as though they had been the worst kind of sinners all their lives.

"SAM," said a mother to her youngest hopeful, "do you know what the difference is between the body and the soul? The soul, my child, is what you love with, the body carries you about. This is the body (touching the little fellow's shoulders and arms), but there is something deeper in; you can feel it now. What is that?" "Oh! I know," said Sam, with a flash of intelligence in his eyes, "that's my flannel shirt!"

"MOTHER, is Dod everywhere?" "Certainly, my son." "In me, mother?" "Yes, my child." "In every part of me, mother?" "Assuredly. Why do you ask?" "Oh, I was only thinking that you mustn't spank me any more." "And why not?" "Because, mother, when you spank me you spank Dod, and you ought to stop it." If this theory of the universe be admitted as true it will change the universal method of parental disciplin.

AT a church in Halle is preserved a thighbone of the Virgin Mary, which has the reputation of working wonderful cures in case of female barrenness. Of this thighbone, or chasse, the following story is related: Once upon a time there resided at Ghent a couple who were blessed with all the riches of this world, but whose happiness was sore troubled for the want of children. Great was the grief of the lady, who was both beautiful and loving, and many her lamentations to her husband. The latter, annoyed by her unceasing sorrow, advised her to make a pilgrimage to the celebrated chasse of the Virgin. She went, was absent about a week, and returned with a face all radiant with joy and pleasure. Her lamentations ceased, and, in due course, she brought forth a son. But oh! the instability of human joys! The babe, so long desired and so greatly beloved, survived but a few months. Two years passed over the heads of the disconsolate couple, and no second child appeared to cheer their fireside. A third year passed away with the same result, and the lady once more began to weep. "Cheer up, my love," said her husband, "and go to the holy chasse at Halle, perhaps the Virgin will again listen to your prayers." The lady took courage at the thought, wiped away her tears, and proceeded on the morrow toward Halle. She was absent only three days, and returned home, sad, weeping, and sorrow-stricken. "What is the matter?" said her husband. "Is the Virgin unwilling to listen to your prayers?" "The Virgin is willing enough," said the disconsolate wife, "and will do what she can for me; but I shall never hav any more children! The priest! The priest! He is gone from Halle, and nobody knows where to find him!"—Charles Mackay.

SCRIPTURAL ENCOURAGEMENT TO MURDERERS.

Notes and Clippings.

Of the one thousand and three hundred policemen of Chicago, it is said that eleven hundred and seventy-five belong to the Catholic church.

Says Professor Swing, who has just been elected a trustee of a Methodist college, speaking of the contest of reason with Christianity: "Whether anything of Christianity will remain, is the important and painful question."

Dr. Ellis says in a recent address in Boston: "Take the republic of Ecuador, where Romanism holds sway to-day, and what do we find? One quarter of all property is owned by the Roman corporation, ten per cent of the population are ecclesiastics, and three-quarters of all births are illegitimate."

Throughout Italy the principal towns are, one after another, providing buildings for the treatment of hydrophobia according to Pasteur's system, and the municipal council of Rome has lately decided to devote the necessary sum of money to furnishing a Pasteur institution there. This is a strong proof of the increasing confidence felt in the treatment.

The conflict in Canada to-day is, whether the French Jesuits shall rule or English Protestants. The same issue is being prepared for the people of the United States. "In peace prepare for war." The first thing to be done to prepare for this war is to close the thirty thousand Jesuit parochial schools, remove every Jesuit Romanist from the school board, and discharge every Jesuit Romanist teacher now being paid from the school fund to do the work of an Italian priest.—Western American.

The appointment of a high ecclesiastical tribunal by the pope for the Roman Catholic church in the United States is believed to hav already been made, although inquiry fails to develop the existence of official notification. The information obtained is to the effect that the tribunal or court shall hav referred to it all cases in which the church in the United States is concerned for adjudication, and that the tribunal consists of Cardinal Gibbons, of Baltimore; Archbishop Ryan, of Philadelphia, and Archbishop Corrigan, of New York. The object of the tribunal is to relieve Rome of the burden of hearing appeals from this country.

Chief Mayes's treatment of the Cherokee commissioners is universally condemned throughout the territory of Oklahoma. Secretary Speed, of the commission, upon his return to Guthrie, was besieged by a host of Cherokee strip boomers anxious to learn from him the prospects for the strip opening next spring. This indicates that the rush will be enormous, notwithstanding the opening of the great Sioux reservation. It is believed that Guthrie will be the headquarters of the Cherokee commissioners. In a few weeks they will begin negotiations with the Chickasaws. There is no doubt but that a large part of the Chickasaw reservation will be thrown open to settlement next spring. Immediately after the territorial convention Secretary Speed will join Judge Wilson in the Chickasaw Nation, where they will be soon followed by General Fairchild. It is believed that the present territorial convention will confine itself to framing an organization act and a memorial to Congress.

We sincerely hope that Dr. Brown-Sequard, of London, and Dr. Hammond, of Washington, are not playing upon us elderly gentlemen a practical joke, by pretending that they can inject into our shrunken veins the juices of rabbits and guinea-pigs, and thus giv to our advancing years the strength and vigor of a renewed and buoyant youth. Even the amount of twenty years taken from the threescore now attained would be a most grateful fact, and, as we now view the project, we think we would willingly submit to the injected matter unless we felt it would seriously impair our usefulness hereafter by imparting to us the nature of the pig and the courage of the rabbit. Nor yet do we see why this new being might not be attended with great success, for, indeed, we know many men with all the instincts of the hog, all the moral and mental deficiencies of the "bunnie," who hav admirable success in life. At all events, we will try one term of twenty years.—Argonaut.

A most curious paper has been found in the archives of the Nürnberg-Fürther railway, the first railway constructed in Germany. It is the official opinion of the Bavarian High Medical Collegium concerning the probable effect of the general introduction of railway travel upon the health of Bavarian subjects. The rapidity of the new transit would, according to the learned doctors, "certainly cause a brain disease which would eventually develop into delirium furiosum. Of course everyone who wished to expose himself to this consequence of the new mode of travel might be allowed to do so undisturbed by the state Other persons, however, should be protected from the perils attendant upon the rapid locomotion. Spectators by the wayside were liable to brain trouble after merely watching the passing steam-cars. Therefore the railway and cars should be concealed from view by close board fences at least five yards high. All things considered, a still better way of protecting the subjects of the Bavarian crown would be to forbid altogether the construction of the railway." This opinion was given in 1835 in response to a government inquiry.

Benjamin Franklin's Belief.—You desire to know something of my religion. It is the first time I hav been questioned upon it. But I cannot take your curiosity amiss, and shall endeavor in a few words to gratify it. Here is my creed. I believe in one God, the creator of all the universe. That he governs it by his providence. That he ought to be worshiped. That the most acceptable service we render to him is doing good to his other children. That the soul of man is immortal, and will be treated with justice in another world respecting its conduct in this. As to Jesus of Nazareth, my opinion of whom you particularly desire, I think his system of morals and his religion as he left them to us the best the world ever saw or is like to see; but I apprehend it has received various corrupting changes, and I hav some doubts as to his divinity; though it is a question I do not dogmatize upon, having never studied it. I see no harm, however, in its being believed, if that belief has the good consequences, as probably it has, of making his doctrins more respected and more observed.—The Complete Works of Benjamin Franklin—John Bigelow

Communications.

On the War Path.

I read of a man who was down on his knees praying, and God struck him with lightning. And that is just the way with him. When one of his most devoted boomers is on his knees in the spooniest kind of a mood, God givs him a black eye.

We had two churches in our village standing within five rods of each other. God let one burn down and struck the other with lightning. It is generally conceded that man is a little "onsartin." But this should not excite our wonder, for he was created in the image of God, and God has always been a little freakish and never could be depended upon.

A young man thinks he will preach, and so he talks with God about it and God says, "Yes, go preach the gospel." After a time he becomes impressed with the idea that he ought to go and enlighten the heathen. Again he consults God, and God says, "All right, go ahead and convert them." After he gets to Africa God deserts him, and, instead of his converting the heathen they convert him—into a missionary stew.

Sometimes God gets on the rampage and trains his artillery on a church, and, while a minister is on his knees, he takes lightning aim at him and sends him to kingdom come. Then he sends a tornado and sweeps away a whole village. Occasionally he shakes them up with an earthquake, now cholera, now yellow fever, then a flood, then a drouth, and the next thing on the program is to wipe away all the vegetation in a state with grasshoppers. And yet the Christian knows that God is good, and doeth all things well. There is hope of a man who gets drunk, for when he gets sober you can reason with him and appeal to his judgment and manhood and, perhaps, make him see the better way. But the Christian never has lucid intervals. He is superstitiously insane, and thinks the one who is trying to enlighten him and dispel the clouds of superstition is the lunatic.

During the late war, every little while a minister would bob up in the pulpit like a jumping-jack and shriek out, "I see the hand of God in it." If the hand of God was in it he carried a very unsteady hand. Many a man went through the war swearing and drunk and came out without a scratch. Stonewall Jackson prayed every day and got killed.

Some years ago a vessel ran against an iceberg and sank in a few minutes. The boats were loaded too heavily to weather the storm, and they commenced to throw each other overboard. The weak had to succumb to the strong. The most brutal were the survivors. The helpless perished. Women were thrown overboard whose hands were folded in prayer. It was a triumph of muscle and not of mercy. God forsook those in the last hour who were imploring his aid.

With such facts before our eyes, can anything equal the absurdity of the idea that prayer can be available in the hour of danger? A man who believes in the efficacy of prayer, virtually believes that God will change some law of nature by his asking.

Oh, the folly of prayer as a motiv power! It has been tried in peace and in war, by land and by sea, in times of flood and fire, in disease and disasters of every kind, and never so much as affected a feather in the wind.

If a man wants good crops he must observe scientific rules of agriculture. If he wants a safe voyage he must select a stanch vessel, sober and able seamen, no matter whether they pray or swear. If he wants to avoid sickness he must observe the rules of health.

Nothing can be more pernicious than to teach people, the young especially, that by prayer they can be carried successfully through every difficulty and danger, without any regard to rules prescribed by the laws of nature and common sense.

The Crusades paved the country with human bones from the north of Europe to the Holy Land.

The Christian said it was right to cut the throat of a Moslem, because he was an Infidel and denied the sonship of Christ. The Moslem said he would cleave the skull of any Infidel Christian who said the creator of heaven had begotten a son. The Christian bore the cross, the Moslem the crescent. The Christian shouted God, the Moslem shouted Allah. The Christian and the Moslem alike prayed for victory.

Neither the cross nor the crescent, nor the respectiv Gods to which they prayed, had the least thing to do with the result of battle. That depended upon numbers, arms, resources, generalship, and other circumstances, and not upon faith, prayer, or the frowns and favors of the gods.

After all the cross had to succumb to the crescent. "God always favors the" biggest guns and heaviest battalions.

My Christian friends, you who are old enough will remember how differently God acts now from what he did sixty years ago. Then he roasted little babies in hell—he has left that off within a few years. It used to be wicked to do any work after sunset on Saturday; now it is not wicked to work up to 12 o'clock.

Sixty years ago God did not behave at protracted meetings as he does now. Men and women got "struck with the power," and would tumble over and lie on the floor seemingly insensible for a long time. Christians said it was the work of God, and I suppose it was. Some would shout and some would sing; and then they would all pray in concert, and it seemed that each one was trying to make more noise than the other. This heavenly racket has been heard more than a mile.

It was not an uncommon thing for Christians in those days to tell about talking with God, giving the exact words which they heard God say. I hav heard a half dozen in one night tell about hearing the voice of God.

There was a great blow-out at a country schoolhouse, and one night the house was lighted with tallow dips, and they all burnt out; but God wouldn't let up on them, and so they had to "go it in the dark." That is the way God acted at a protracted meeting sixty years ago. I hav no doubt that God managed those meetings, for he always was a little inclined to "go it blind."

There was a protracted meeting here last winter, and it was a very quiet affair. God did not act at all as he did sixty years ago—has he changed? Or did the Christians back in those days hav a spiritual jamboree on their own hook when God was not around?

God showed quite good breeding at the meeting here last winter—I did not hear of his holding any conversation with any of them—he did not get on the rampage and strike them with the "power;" and when they prayed he allowed one to wait for another. In the main it was just threshing over a few old sheaves which had been under God's flail many times before.

God will peter out some day and won't put in an appearance at all when there is one of those spiritual kickups.

In a town west of us they had a blow-out, and night and day for four or five weeks they puffed away at the spiritual bellows and swung the gospel flail, and the result was two little girls and a big negro.

An Irishman got discouraged and said, "Brethren, the Lord is not for us—we hav cast the net at the bow of the ship, and we hav cast the net at the stern of the ship, and we hav cast the net ferninst the ship, and all we hav catched is one big black bullhead and two little shiners."

Superstition no doubt is a great luxury to many, but it is quite expensiv, and the old methods no longer furnish recruits to the church. The bribe of heaven and the scarecrow of hell are no longer heeded by the masses. Persuasiv measures are played out, and now through the "Blare" bill as an entering wedge the crushing process is to be applied. And in my opinion Prohibition and woman suffrage are wheels in the machinery which is to do the crushing.

It is said that every thrifty pig has a kink in its tail. Christians seem to go upon the supposition that it is the kink which makes the pig grow. They hav always been trying to work their Christian kinks on the world, and, as blessings, they hav proved about as abortiv as artificial kinks in pigs' tails. If Harrison, Wanamaker, "Blare" & Co.'s measures prove a blessing to the country, they can make an independent fortune by fattening pigs by artificial kinks instead of food. If a Christian puts a kink in a pig's tail, with the blessing of God, he expects the pig to get fat whether it is fed or not.

To-day a minister was ordained in this place. Holy hands were laid on his head and he was consecrated—set apart for the service of God, or, in other words, to teach such fool philosophy.

How would a farmer's crops turn out if he did all his plowing in the same furrow? But this young man is sacredly bound never to teach a fact unless it is dug out of the old theological rut. He has received the Christian kink, and no doubt will soon be fat. He will fit souls for heaven which are too ignorant to prove a blessing on earth.

> Deep in yon cave Honorius long did dwell
> In hope to merit heaven by making earth a hell.

The difficulty with Christians is, to please God they sacrifice the rights and happiness of man. And their ideas of God are obtained from an old book written by semi-barbarians whom these Christians regard as the wisest men who ever lived. The nearer they approach the state of barbarism in which their book originated, the more perfect they become.

According to this book God is perfect, and has more sympathy for us than an earthly parent can possibly hav for his children. Nothing can transpire contrary to his will. Not a sparrow can fall without his consent. He holds us and our destinies as in the hollow of his hand, his mercy endureth for ever, and his loving kindness transcends that of the most loving parent. And behind this mercy and tenderness is omnipotent power, and he answers the prayers of those who ask in faith. According to this philosophy there should be no calamity by flood or fire. At the hand of nature we should receive no injury.

What would be thought of the kindness of a father who would drown his helpless children or set fire to his house and let them perish in the flames? But this is the way the Christian God manifests his love and care for the children of men.

Sometimes he gets a pique at a state and sends a swarm of grasshoppers which destroys the last vestige of vegetation. All the people go down upon their knees and implore him to stay the scourge, but he doesn't call off the grasshopper. That is the way he answers prayer, and that is the way he displays his loving kindness.

Then he sends a drouth and parches a state as brown as a nutmeg. Again the people go down on their knees and ask for rain, but it does not bring a drop of water.

Then he sends a flood and drowns out the Mississippi valley, and crops and animals are sacrificed to the watery element, and houses and barns and many of the people are carried to swift destruction.

Every few years yellow fever or cholera sweeps its thousands to their graves, and then a tornado lays a country waste; and acting upon the theory that "variety is the spice of life," he threshes a portion of the country with hail, and as if this wholesale havoc could never cease, a portion of the inhabitants of a great city like Lisbon are sent six hundred feet below the surface of the sea by an earthquake, and getting furious in his wrath he trains a great fiery squirt-gun upon a couple of cities and buries them out of sight with all their human interests, as in the case of Pompeii and Herculaneum.

Naples is surrounded by a great fruit district. One night our heavenly father sent a frost and destroyed nearly all the fruit. Many poor men who are almost entirely dependent on their vineyards had their hopes blasted in one night.

I work in my garden on Sunday, and it is about the only one that escaped injury. But I am not puffed by the favor; he will get in his work on me another time.

And that is just the way God acts. Nobody can depend upon him, no matter how good he may be. Even when a good preacher, one of God's chief soppers, is upon his knees, God sends a thunderbolt and knocks his light out. Doesn't this all go to show that God is too treacherous to be depended upon?

And yet we hav a lot of lunatics who want to put this blundering, treacherous God into the Constitution. Before this is done should he not be made to giv bonds for his good behavior, so that the people will hav some assurance that he will carry a more steady hand and not slop over as in times past?

If more power is placed in his hands we shall soon find that he will begin to crowd us to the wall. He may put it into the heads of his chief fuglemen that the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof, and that they are his chosen people, and that we hav no rights which they are bound to respect. With God in the Constitution, and Christ as the supreme ruler, and the government in the hands of Harrison, Wanamaker, "Blare" & Co., we poor devils will be made to smell "burnt wool."

To think how frisky and freaky God has been, and of the antics of these Christian contortionists, ought to make the people careful about placing undue power where it can be abused. I tell you, we want to keep the power out of the hands of such a capricious God as he has shown himself to be, and make the people—all the people—without the least regard to religious preferences, equal before the law. Whenever God gets into the Constitution the devil will be to pay.

Think of a pious crank down on his knees asking favors of a being which he has conjured up in his imagination, dwelling somewhere above the clouds, with eyes, ears, nose, mouth, tongue, hands, and feet, showing his "back parts," and yet "without body or parts," and who or which fills the immensity of space. And think of putting the government in the keeping of hypocritical cranks whose minds are swayed by a belief in such nonsense. When we allow the government to pass exclusivly into the hands of such men as "Blare," Wanamaker, Talmage, and Comstock, or any religious, ignorant, sundo-move class of people, we commit national suicide.

The Johnstown disaster is another lesson in regard to the goodness of God. Thousands, of both sexes, from old age to helpless childhood, meeting death by fire and water in a single hour. Were the wicked taken and the innocent spared? Were favors shown to those who prayed more than to those who cursed? On the contrary, some of the most brutal were spared and many of the innocent taken.

A woman put her seven children from an upper story window out upon the driftwood and trusted them to the care of the creator. Did he take care of them? She says, as she put her youngest boy out, he said, "Mamma, you always said God will take care of me; will he care for me now?" Did God keep the promis to that loving mother? She says, "I saw his face imploringly turned up to me as he floated away in the flood." I am all alone, and no one can see the tear that falls as I narrate this touching incident. The last lesson in the final scene in life's drama was that she had made to her children promises which never could be fulfilled, and which had no foundation in fact.

While the children of this loving mother were sacrificed to the devouring element, the most loathsome thieves and robbers were spared—even those who mutilated the dead to rob them of their jewelry. If the minds of Christians were not rendered obtuse by early education, they would learn that one passage of scripture at least is true, viz., that "God is no respecter of persons"—that those who believe and pray fare no better than those who disbelieve and swear. In that disaster far more women and children were drowned than men. One would think if God was partial to any it would be to the innocent. But in this, as in all other cases, he helped those who least needed his help. Those with strong arms and presence of mind were the favored ones. All in keeping with that everlasting law of the "survival of the fittest." JOHN PECK.

A Visit.

I dropped in to see my old friend, Snug, the other day. Snug livs in an old-bachelor style, hiring apartments in a respectable but rather out-of-the-way block, preferring the comparativ quiet that reigns there to the din of the more business part of the city. Snug's means are what many would regard as limited; he livs on the slow but sure sale of an article which the world had long got along without, but which many hav confessed, by purchasing, to be convenient to hav in the family. What the article is I decline to mention, lest my readers might think I surreptitiously sought to advertise when I honestly meant to hav a little table-talk with them. Snug doesn't think his means are limited. On the contrary, he says he is the most independent man in the city. This is the way he puts it:

I am a trifle over seventy years of age, though free from the infirmities and ailments common to the septuagenarian; and, doubtless, for the same reason given by Adam in "As You Like It"—that is, along with, originally, a good constitution:

> For in my youth I never did apply
> Hot and rebellious liquors to my blood,
> Nor did, with unabashed forehead,
> Woo the means of weakness and debility.

I enjoy life with a keen relish, furnishing myself with the comforts of good living by the sale of an article people will buy till another thing of the same sort will be invented; something superior to mine, which, thank my stars, is so very trifling in itself, that nobody capable of inventing anything will regard it as worth trying to beat, thus giving me a dead sure thing on a living for the short time left for me to need grub and toggery. I hav no buildings for accident or incendiaries to destroy, or to invite the tax-gatherers to call. I do not owe anybody a red, and I hav more than enough to cover all expenses incident to a modest funeral.

Well, that secures all that is wanted as far as absolute personal independence as a citizen goes. And, in pleasing superaddition, I say of my spiritual needs, I hav a lot of books, as you perceive, books I believe in. There are few authors known as great, either as scientists, historians, philosophers, and poets, who are not found on my shelves. Good company, if they do turn their backs on you as you sit. I am, besides, in the receipt of two sterling monthlies, one daily paper, and three weeklies; one upholding Socialism, the other Agnostic in its teachings, but defending Freethought with the force of a blizzard, yet with the humane purpose of a generous spirit; the third is devoted to orthodox religion, by which I am enabled to keep alive the mummeries of ancient humbug and keep posted on the necromancies of the modern pulpit. I take life easy throughout the week, and on Sunday I still take life easy.

No, I don't attend church. I do not even attend the beer gardens. Not that I hav an activ per se objection to the former, knowing that advanced wisdom alone will close the doors of the joss-house. And, as for the gardens, they hav not attraction enough about them to hav one take the trouble to attend them. I confess, however, I hav often regretted the lack of something of a sort between the two, where my spirit might find more room than it can in the one, and less of license than it does in the other. The one is so excruciatingly good, sacred, holy, and all that sort of thing, with a dismal ceremonial attached, that makes my plain, ordinary, mannish nature revolt at it.

I can hardly conceive of a greater calamity befalling a man than his becoming "good enough" to join a church. He is apt to become a sad dog. You needn't be surprised after that if you should find him peddling tracts that tell of bears coming out of the woods to tear naughty grocers to pieces for sanding and dampening the sugar while he is charging you an extra price. In these days the influence a church membership exerts is necessarily deteriorating, inclining most men to cheat and to delude. And for this reason: hypocrisy is fraudulent, and is used by "smart" men to gull with impunity. They do not believe what they affect to regard as the truth. Well may they repeat the pious platitude, "We are sinners," if for no other reason than the sin of membership. There is not an intelligent thinker among them who is not a disbeliever in the cosmogony attributed to Moses; and discrediting that involves repudiation of the atonement, thus sinking their faith below the farthest zero of unbelief. And in massiv assurance of their unbelief it is not unusual to hear them say, when cornered, that the church is a needed institution as a civilizer, exercising a repressiv influence on the vile and the brutal. Well, the vile and the brutal need repressing, every good citizen will allow; but it seems to me that the better way to repress the vile and the brutal is not by lashing them with a lie, but by enlightening them by giving them to know that the reason we try to head them off in their folly and criminality is because their conduct is really and truly an offense to society, and only for that reason. To lie is a dangerous experiment, particularly to do so in order to suppress crime, for just as soon as the fraud is discovered the criminal laughs at your threats. Society stands in that position to-day. It has found the ancient theology to be a conglomerate of lies, and the cry of "Wolf! wolf!" an artifice to frighten simple souls. How the bookish clergyman can hav the cheek to stand in the way of the régime of the modern scientist is to me explainable only on the hypothesis suggested by the Scottish saying: "Better the deil ye ken than the deil ye dinna ken;" the deil in this case being the soft thing he is now enjoying and the chances of being counted out by a change. And so the parson spits on his hands and takes a new hold of the orthodox rope, booming his hopes on the tenacity of the old strands and the new twists given to them by their spiritual helpmeets, the Salvationists and sich.

I hav more than once been made to see no need of dread on the part of the parson of running out of business; the vitality of the old theology, together with its ready inherent adaptability to change—an adaptability the result of heredity, its origin being due to acceptance of beliefs long antedating the time of its founders—Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, each an immigrant from different nationalities meeting and joining interests in mutual traffic, heedless of tariff. Modification has been the law of its existence; its vitality being such that though torn and dismembered by agonies innumerable, the several parts liv, move, and hav an independent being, all happy as grigs, and each hugging the impression of being the real simon pure—from popery to latest sect.

Indeed, in calling to mind the ridiculous features of the pulpit of sixty years ago, I can see in its yielding spirit the Proteus of our era, the pantaloon of the pantomime striking his blows of transformation. The coarse, clumsy cartwhip of the Puritan has been covered with velvet, that is all. Burns had put the diabolism in verse but a short time before in his "Holy Willie's Prayer:"

> O thou wha in the heavens do dwell,
> Wha as it pleases best thysel,
> Sends ane to heaven and twal to hell,
> A' for thy glory,
> And no for ony gude or ill
> They've dune afore thee!
> . . . . .
> But, Lord, remember me and mine,
> Wi' blissins temporal and divine,
> That I for gear and grace may shine
> Excelled by nane;
> And a' the glory shall be thine.
> Amen, Amen.

Look at it now with its extinguished hell—the word itself doomed to extinction, superseded as it is by sheol. How long, think you, will sheol last? Long enough to giv the souls of the antique heathen time to accept the invitation, "Come to Jesus?"

> Belief is a phantom and hope is vain,
> And worship is naught but a thing of the brain;
> A will-o'-the-wisp in the marsh of the mind,
> That time still whistles adown the wind;
> Often a wish, more often a fear;
> And truth is seldom the same each year;
> A series of always dissolving views,
> Still to accept and still to choose.

There is nothing to mourn over in life. The "ills that flesh is heir to" is a quotation having no justification to the philosopher. The sentiment was born of the idiocy of early asceticism, and has been part of the stock in trade of the rantipole religious tramps, using it as mendicants do puling appeals for charity. To shed tears or sigh over the inevitable is queer enough. And is not everything said and done stamped as inevitable? To do wrong calls for amended conduct and for compensation to the injured. To go to Jesus with whining supplications for pardon is a lame and impotent conclusion; and is of the spirit of the masquerader who borrows clothes in which to play pretender. "Hav mercy upon us, miserable sinners," is the merest cant; used on Sunday only, however—a fact for which we can not be too thankful.

It would be well for people who seem to feel it to be their duty to caution others how to conduct themselvs on the first day of the week, to remember that, outside their fettering influence, persons can be found who can intelligently discuss what is due to society, and by their daily walk and conversation assist in elevating the moral and intellectual standard of the public without conforming one iota to their ancient dogmas. It is due to moral cowardice, not to conviction of the truthfulness of their creed, that the vast majority of "believers" allow the pulpit representativs of worn-out theology to exercise so swaying a control as they do. In the face of the developments of science for the past half century, claiming Sunday or any other day as holy, God having rested from his labor in building the world on the "seventh day," is an absurdity so utterly astounding in the face of the geological revelations of our period as to defy a parallel. A man's conduct is to be shaped by his relationship to his fellows, and not by trumpery observances of so-called "sacred" days. And seven-eighths of the intelligent of our population know it. And but for the conventional thraldom to time-worn observances, and the gloss of respectability it involves, they would range on the side of Freethought.

I know of no language sufficiently strong to condemn the bulldozing which seeks to coerce a citizen to do or withhold doing what the most common intelligence is sufficient in assuring us is the correct standard of conduct in life. And I am equally at a loss for words to characterize the willful blundering which struggles against the light that flashes from the conclusions of the scientists of our day. It would be better for us to seek the reputation of a little wisdom rather than of maundering piety.

Individual cases of criminality, however atrocious, are no more evidences of human depravity than are examples of piety proofs of Christian purity. Sin, as popularly understood, is the result of unwise treatment, not of the individual, but of society. Mankind hav, through the absurd teachings of the churches, been so thoroughly dogmatized by unnatural teachings that they do not hesitate to lay flattering unctions to each other's souls, while they scoff at the vain anodynes when applied to themselvs. They say of the kindly soul who through a long life, like Dorcas, made garments for the poor, while she sometimes suffered by reason of her poverty, "she shall hav her exceeding great reward." What but trifling with the weightiest facts of life are such assurances? Dorcas, in adversity, making garments for the poor, is but playing the part of Mrs. Partington, who used her broom against the waves of the Atlantic. She is but struggling against un-wisdom—a social lock that girdles humanity as with a zone.

With a great show of sympathetic wisdom, my orthodox paper says: "Sin swelters in cities." To which I reply: In this, at least, that so many wretched people lie down each night on beds that are not beds and rise on the morrow not knowing where to break their fast. Sin does not flaunt in silks so much as it does in rags. This is sin: enriching self at the expense of the comfort of others. By far the worst feature about church teaching is the invitation to take shelter from self-accusation for shortcoming in individual treatment of the indigent in the text, "The poor ye hav always with you." There is a soporific in the assurance that God permits the wholesale suffering, enabling some to possess their souls in Christian patience. It is the will of our heavenly father; bear it with equanimity. The finite cannot comprehend the infinit; therefore, seek not the solution of the inevitable. "In the sweet by and bye" all secrets will be revealed. How different the teaching of my Socialistic sheet, which says, "The poor are mostly they who, by personal organization, are incapable of understanding the laws that regulate the acquisition of wealth"—words originally used by the Scotch phrenologist, Combe. Competition paralyzes effort in many men, dooming them to poverty and contempt, while to others it whispers the secret that swings back the door of the cave of opulence.

Refuse to accept evolution as the solvent of life's mysteries, and existence is truly a heartless conundrum; a mass of entanglements defying extrication; bringing society to its knees in vain implorings for the light that cannot come—justifying the exclamation of the German: "There is no father!" Modern science is at once the savior and the comforter; giving the true solution of life's mystery, and calling for added human wisdom to direct and guide all forces of society for the universal good; not merely to glorify God.

Accepting the postulates of the modern scientist, the mind becomes tranquillized—confidingly awaiting time's issues—sure in the conviction that, as nature holds within herself all agencies of differentiation as applied to life, she will not be wanting in the appliances needed to giv equity to society. And with that deduction as my polar star, I say, Toward Socialism the star of empire holds its way. 74.

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our ociety was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

Correction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the last number of THE TRUTH SEEKER you make me promis to hav the "offer" for the prize manual ready for publication "about September 1st," whereas I wrote or intended to write September 15th. It will be impossible to arrange all the preliminary details so soon, as it takes time to confer with all the contributors, as I suggested in my original "proposition." Please correct, and in the mean time let our friends send on their money for incidental expenses.

The Great Convention at Portland, Ore.

So far as the question of a large attendance at the Masonic Hall, Portland, Ore., October 12th, 13th, 14th, is concerned, letters from all parts of Washington banish all anxiety, and the shrewd, excellent judgment of the committee in presenting such unparalleled attractions at the opening session on Saturday morning will insure all making especial efforts to be present at the very commencement of the convention.

It is now certain that there will be lectures and addresses by the most able exponents of our principles; a grand gathering; a grand rally of leading Liberals; a full report of the convention in all the leading journals of the Northwest; the jolliest, merriest, most brilliant and enjoyable ball; the most social and superb supper (free), and the awakening of unbounded enthusiasm.

And yet there is serious cause for very great anxiety.

Because all this will eventually count for naught, unless the opportunity is improved to fully discuss, decide, and harmonize on a practical plan to carry on the work.

The enemy is vigilant, well organized, provided with abundance of funds, and unscrupulous. Both our state legislatures must be sharply watched, the schemes of the foes to liberty watched, the needed Liberal literature distributed, not alone among the members of our legislativ bodies, but also among their constituents at home, so they will be induced to use their influence to insure just and prevent unjust and vicious legislation.

The living voice of our representativ must be heard, the face be seen, the presence felt, and the irresistible arguments of truth properly presented. Efforts should be made to insure our Liberal papers a very large increase of their circulation. Every able, worthy lecturer should receive encouragement, that others yet more able may be induced to take the field.

The churches receive a vast sum yearly for preaching Christianity, superstition, and intolerance, and to carry out their fanatical, liberty-destroying schemes. How needful that every precaution be taken that our limited funds are used wisely and guarded from the possibility of waste or misapplication!

Those powerful organizations, the National Reform Association, the American Sabbath Union, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union, hav joined forces, pledging themselvs to more determined and persistent efforts to enforce rigid observance of Sunday, and to use every lawful means and influence to defeat all and every candidate for political office who will not pledge themselvs to do all in their power to secure: "An acknowledgment and performance of the nation's duty to guard and protect the church; by suppressing all public violation of the moral law; by maintaining a system of public schools, indoctrinating their youth in morality and virtue; by exempting church property from taxation, and by providing her funds out of the public treasury for carrying on her aggressiv work at home, and in the foreign field" (Christian Statesman).

Liberals of Oregon and Washington, what will you do to defeat these schemers?

How much money shall we contribute? In what manner shall it be collected, and how shall our contributions be expended?

We must depend on the wealthy Liberals to giv generously of their abundance. But let the poorest wage-worker feel that in this struggle he or she is an honored helper, giving from scant store as freely and more in proportion than the possessor of superabundance, thus maintaining independence and doubling his interest in the work, while the wealthy, knowing that all are doing all they can, will be encouraged to come to the rescue in times of great or special need.

We hav reached the critical time when every lover of liberty must do his or her full share in helping forward the work.

Come to the Portland convention; let us hav a grand, good time. But let the enjoyment of the grand ball and sumptuous banquet be intensified by the delightful assurance, So far, we hav done our duty; the plan of future work is decided on, and is one on which all can unite. And then the enjoyment and enthusiasm of this convention will only be the precursor of that glorious celebration of the ultimate victory of reason, right, truth, and liberty so soon to follow.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

Crime and Pauperism in Massachusetts.

The Massachusetts state census for 1885 givs a total of 655 state prisoners, 558 males and 107 females; 249 being between the ages of 20 and 29 years. Of these 665 prisoners, 396 are American born; 339 men and 56 women; 270 of them are foreign born, 161 having been born in Ireland.

But of these 665 prisoners, 112 were born in Massachusetts of Irish parents, 22 were born in other states of Irish parents; a total of 298 of Irish birth or parentage. Besides this, five other prisoners were children of Irish mothers, and nine were children of Irish fathers, making, out of the 665 state prisoners, 312, or nearly one-half, one or both of whose parents were Irish.

In 1885 in the various prisons, jails, and reformatories of Massachusetts, there were 3,426 prisoners convicted of crime and sentenced; 2,836 being males, and 590 females; 1,395 being from 20 to 29 years old. Of these 3,426 prisoners, 2,163 were nativ born, and 1,263 were foreign born; 703 of the foreign born being from Ireland. Only 257 of the 3,426 were children of parents who were both born in Massachusetts, while 1,262 were children whose parents were both born in Ireland. In addition to this there were 58 who were children of Irish mothers, and 57 were children of Irish fathers, making a total of 1,377 out of 3,426, one or both of whose parents were born in Ireland.

In 1885 there were in Massachusetts 5,232 homeless children, many of them of course made homeless by the intemperance and crime of their parents; there were but 682 of these whose parents were born in Massachusetts; while there were 1,056 whose parents were born in Ireland, and 2,744 whose parents' birthplaces were unknown. But in addition to this there were 207 who had Irish mothers, and 155 who had Irish fathers; making a total of 1,418 out of the 5,232 homeless children who were known to be children of Irish parents besides some of the 1,744 whose parental nationality was unknown.

There were in the state of Massachusetts in 1885 a total of 8,394 paupers; 4,129 males and 4,265 females; 4,698 of the whole being nativ born, and 3,714 being born in Massachusetts; 3,696 being foreign born, and of these 2,829 were Irish. But of the 8,394 paupers, there were 2,431 who were children of Irish parents; 30 who were children of Irish mothers, and 30 who were children of Irish fathers, making a total of 5,320 out of 8,394, or nearly five-eighths, one or both of whose parents were born in Ireland.

Of the 122,263 illiterate persons in Massachusetts, only 13,898 are nativ born and 108,365 are foreigners. Of the 13,898 nativ-born illiterates, only 8,297 were born in Massachusetts. Of the 108,365 foreign-born illiterates, 24,190, or 19.70 per cent, were French Canadians, and 67,169, or 54.94 per cent, were Irish.

Hence it appears that the Irish and the French Canadians furnish nearly three-fourths of all the illiterate persons in Massachusetts, and of all the illiterates in Massachusetts only 2.08 per cent had parents both of whom were born in the state; 70,666, or 57.8 per cent of all the illiterates, were of Irish parentage, and 26,852, or 21.99 per cent, had French Canadian parents. So that of the entire number of illiterates in the state, only 4.92 per cent are of nativ parentage, while 93.06 per cent are of foreign parentage, mostly Irish and French Canadian.

There were also in 1885 in the state of Massachusetts, 5,058 insane persons, 2,237 males and 2,821 females. Of these 3,175 are nativ, 1,571 males and 1,604 females; 1,883 are foreign, 666 males and 1,217 females.

Besides these there are 84 insane persons who are also maimed, lame, bedridden, paralytic, or deformed, 56 of whom are nativ and 28 foreign, making a total of 5,142 insane persons, 1,911 of whom are foreign born, besides those which are of foreign parentage; and a large proportion of these insane persons are brought to the insane asylums by the same curse which fills our prisons and almshouses, strong drink, sold by Irish Catholic rumsellers to their poor ignorant countrymen.

The whole matter may thus be briefly stated:

Foreign Roman Catholic rumsellers make foreign paupers, criminals, lunatics, and vagrants. Foreign voters, controled by foreign priests and foreign saloon-keepers, and misled by newspapers and telegraphic reports, edited, controled, and manipulated by the same parties and in their interest, foster the rum business, elect foreign-born officials, trade with corrupt politicians, license Irish Catholic rumsellers, control the politics of the country, fill the land with drunkenness, violence, vice, misrule, and crime, and now propose to assail the common schools, and train up their own children under the exclusiv control of teachers and leaders whose methods of instruction and training hav already been so fruitful in crime and drunkenness and pauperism.—Rev. H. L. Hastings.

The Wastes of Modern Civilization.

Under the above name the old friend of our readers and ourself, Prof. Felix L. Oswald, M.D., is contributing a series of papers to the Popular Science Monthly. From the last instalment of this series we will try to gather such parts as will be of special interest to Antichristians.

Among the wastes of our civilization dealt with in the present paper the chief is, the waste of time and mental endeavor in teaching our young the dead languages. This practice has always drawn its support from the same element that teaches theology and kindred follies, while the opponents of the practice hav almost invariably been Freethinkers. Freethinkers hav ever perceived that no matter how many names for an object we may go on and learn, we hav not in all this learned the first thing about the properties of that object. And they know that it is the properties of things that we must learn, our welfare and even existence depending in exact proportion upon how well we can learn them. "What," says Herbert Spencer, in bitter contempt of those who foster the antiquated system, "what shall we say of the wisdom of those, including nearly all who occupy influential positions, who persist in thinking that preparation for successful and complete living (which is the purpose of rational education) is best effected by learning to speak and write after the manner of two extinct peoples, and by gaining knowledge of their chief men, their superstitions, their deeds of war, etc.—who, in their leading school, devote two hours per week to getting some ideas about the constitution of the world they are born into, and thirty-six hours per week to construing Latin and Greek, and making verses, of small sense or none; and who, in the competitiv examinations they devise, giv to knowledge of words double the number of marks which they giv to knowledge of things? That, it seems to me, is not a very worshipful degree of intelligence which fails to recognize the obvious truth that there is an Order of Nature, pervading alike the actions going on within us and without us, to which, from moment to moment, our lives must conform under penalty of one or other evil; and that therefore our first business must be to study this Order of Nature."

Thomas Paine in his time had also seen the evil of the old system of instruction, and assigned as its motiv the Christian desire to divert education from science, which it knew would be fatal to itself. Says Paine: "As the Christian system of faith has made a revolution in theology, so also has it made a revolution in the state of learning. That which is now called learning, was not learning, originally. Learning does not consist, as the schools now make it consist, in the knowledge of languages, but in the knowledge of things to which language givs names. The Greeks were a learned people, but learning with them did not consist in speaking Greek, any more than in a Roman's speaking Latin, or a Frenchman's speaking French, or an Englishman's speaking English. From what we know of the Greeks, it does not appear that they knew or studied any language but their own, and this was one cause of their becoming so learned; it afforded them more time to apply themselvs to better studies. The schools of the Greeks were schools of science and philosophy, and not of languages; and it is in the knowledge of the things that science and philosophy teach, that learning consists. Almost all the scientific learning that now exists, came to us from the Greeks, or the people who spoke the Greek language. It, therefore, became necessary for the people of other nations, who spoke a different language, that some among them should learn the Greek language, in order that the learning the Greeks had, might be made known in those nations, by translating the Greek books of science and philosophy into the mother tongue of each nation. The study, therefore, of the Greek language (and in the same manner for the Latin) was no other than the drudgery business of a linguist; and the language thus obtained, was no other than the means, as it were the tools, employed to obtain the learning the Greeks had. It made no part of the learning itself; and was so distinct from it, as to make it exceedingly probable that the persons who had studied Greek sufficiently to translate those works, such, for instance, as Euclid's Elements, did not understand any of the learning the works contained. . . . The setters-up, therefore, and the advocates of the Christian system of faith, could not but foresee that the continually progressiv knowledge that man would gain, by the aid of science, of the power and wisdom of God, manifested in the structure of the universe, and in all the works of creation, would militate against, and call into question, the truth of their system of faith; and therefore it became necessary to their purpose to cut learning down to a size less dangerous to their project, and this they effected by restricting the idea of learning to the dead study of dead languages."

Recalling ourselvs from digressiv quoting of others of our thinkers on the topic, we will present some paragraphs of Professor Oswald:

The experience of the last three hundred years has as yet failed to disassociate the ideas of Latin and Greek from the scholastic notions of culture, and the time may come when practical educators will almost fail to realize the possibility of the fact that, in our own rapid age of discovery and invention, millions of our most gifted students had to waste from one-third to three-fifths of their time on the study of dead languages. Witness the following curriculum of the German Gymnasia, or high schools—the preparatory colleges of the best European universities, and the gates to every highway of liberal education:

Latin, ten hours per week; Greek, eight hours; Hebrew, three hours; German, four hours; mathematics, four hours; geography, two; history, two; drawing, two; French, two; physiology, two; religion, optional; English, optional (occasionally taught instead of French); gymnastics, four hours. In other words, twenty-one hours of graveyard studies to eighteen hours of all living sciences taken together, since gymnastics has ceased under certain circumstances to be a compulsory branch of education.

Those twenty-four hours devoted to the dead leave not a minute's time for the study of such problems of life as biology and rational hygiene; not a minute for anatomy, political economy, philosophy, rhetoric, or non-sectarian ethics. Such things, of course, are taught by the regular or special professors of the university; but a large percentage of students pass directly from the primer-class of the gymnasium to the duties of practical life, and in ninety-nine of a hundred cases may charge the long period given to the study of the ancient languages to the budget of total loss. Not one of a hundred non-philological students (graduates devoting themselvs to the special study and the teaching of ancient languages) would ever dream of continuing his antiquarian pursuits or be able to look upon a Greek or Latin text-book without a shudder of disgust. . . . The New World continues to emulate the Old in wooing the specters of the past, and thousands of American parents encumber the memory of their children with a mass of antiquarian rubbish that leaves no room for the culture of progressiv science, too often not even for the adequate study of their own mother-tongue.

The next waste our author considers is the waste consequent upon teaching our children theories which they must violate in practice, and encouraging practice which is condemned by their theories. He expresses himself thus:

A cardinal tenet of medieval ethics was the belief in the merit of mental prostitution—the duty of submitting to dogmas which their professors did not and could not believe, and which the exigencies of daily life obliged them practically to repudiate.

A logical consequence of that doctrin was the antagonism of theory and practice, which continues to involve an enormous waste in our method of moral education. A million pulpits still preach a gospel that inculcates the vanity of industrial pursuits. "Take no thought of the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself." "Take no thought, saying, What shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or wherewithal shall we be clothed? For after all these do the gentiles seek." As a practical comment on the wisdom of those precepts, nations, cities, and corporations vie in the restless pursuit of wealth, and a thousand lessons of daily life admonish the young citizen of our industrial world to take earnest and constant thought of the morrow; nay, the mere attempt to disregard those lessons would be followed by the punishment of the shiftless vagrant.

Loss of health and wealth, loss of working capacity—in fact, every form of temporal affliction—the disciples of our moral exemplar are instructed to consider as proofs of divine favor. Yet the prevention of such favors is the legally encouraged purpose of dozens of fire and life insurance companies and mutual aid associations with their omnipresent agencies.

Our ethical text-books in the plainest terms teach the possibility of curing diseases by prayer and mystic ceremonies. "If any man is sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." "And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." "And when he called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits, to cast them out and to heal all manner of disease." Yet in at least forty-five of the fifty most civilized countries of Christendom the attempt to cure any serious disease on that plan would be followed by a prompt indictment for quackery.

The possibility of diabolical apparitions is implied in a countless number of passages which our traditional creed requires us to accept as infallible truth. Devils by scores and legions range the land of faith, tempting the virtuous, afflicting men and animals with strange diseases, or even taking permanent possession of a human body still tenanted by a conscious soul. The report of a five minutes' interview with the smallest of those imps would now expose the narrator to the risk of a lunacy inquest.

The worthlessness of earthly life is inculcated with a distinctness which seems intended as an encouragement to the indirect suicide of monastic asceticism; yet the same moralists who bewail this earth as a vale of tears take the liveliest interest in the prolongation of human life, and court popularity by indorsing every measure tending to promote the progress of sanitary reform.

The inevitable result of such inconsistencies is a moral confusion resembling the bewilderment of the guests invited to the banquet of Rueckert's Hakim Baba, who urged his visitors to indulge in wine, but thrashed them fearfully if they showed any signs of intoxication.

From the chaos of conflicting theoretical and practical lessons our children, by the aid of experience, somehow manage to evolve a moral compromise code of their own; but what a waste of time could be saved, how many hours of doubt, perplexity, and repentance could be obviated, by a system of ethics inculcating precepts in harmony with the laws of nature and the facts of actual life!

Rome's Designs on New Mexico.

The following is a translation of a circular in Spanish that is being distributed to the Catholics in New Mexico:

(CONFIDENTIAL.)

All members of the holy Catholic church, and especially all those of our people of Mexican blood, to whom this sign may come, are invited to read this carefully and to weigh its contents:

We ask you to respect all that is contained in this paper as a thing stated in strict confidence. You are summoned in this because we believe you to be a faithful son of the church and know you to be a man of considerable influence. A convention to make a constitution for the new state of Mexico will be held in the town of Santa Fe on the 3d of next September. It is the pronounced intention of the enemies of our religion to send delegates to said convention who will make the organic law for the purpose to compel you to deny your children all kinds of education except that of the world. The plan is to provide in that constitution that you may be compelled to pay taxes for the support of public schools, notwithstanding that you cannot, from conscientious scruples, permit your children to be educated in such places.

No faithful son of the church and no man of the Mexican people who is in accord with what is due to himself and the traditions of his fathers will submit to this. The contest in the last legislature proves how great the danger is that this execrable and wicked education should be forced upon us. The escape then was but a very narrow escape. We now hav it in our power to avoid this calamity by taking hold of the business in good time and working well and hard for what is right.

The election for delegates is ordered for the 5th day of August. We hav to organize and work together without rest to the end in view that our own people and the men of our own faith should rule in that convention. We invite you to join with our friends who are in sympathy with our feelings. Teach them in confidence, one to another, this invocation: "Work in silence." Choose and nominate faithful men for delegates—men whom we can depend upon and who shall agree in secret to defend our church forever against the sacrilegious and arrogant spirit now threatening us. It is well to do it at once, but keep carefully the secret of your intentions. Do not allow personal ambition or preferences to bring discord between you. Always keep in view the design to defend our religion and our people from the usurpations of men who hav the clear intention to domineer and subjugate us.

What they call progress is the progress of perdition. Their bombastic energy is their groundwork to deprive us of our homes and our possessions.

Through a united effort now we can insure the adoption of a constitution recognizing our holy religion and the erection of safeguards against the usurpations of these adventurers. We repeat again, to guard the secret and to march with vigilance. Direct well your primary meetings, and that the delegates to this convention are men who shall keep in mind the claims of their religion and of the Mexican race.

Three Hundred Home-made Gods.

From the Philadelphia Press.

READING, Aug. 13th.—A most remarkable character has just been unearthed here. He is a thorough idolator, and daily bows down to gods of his own manufacture within sound of the churchgoing bells, as reverently and devoutly as the most pious Hindoo or Zulu. He has made a religion entirely his own, and has evolved out of it some three hundred or more gods, who dwell in and speak through the same number of idols of clay, which form the chief furniture of his house. He is constantly making the acquaintance of new supernatural beings, and as soon as he does so he proceeds to make an image, which is supposed to represent the outward and physical habiliments of the new divinity. All of his gods are hollow, and are from time to time filled with such food as he thinks their peculiar nature demands.

Among others he has a god of medicin. This is filled with pills and odd prescriptions, and whenever he feels unwell he prays to this divinity, and always, he says, with beneficial results. He has a god of sewing machines, which is filled with blank contracts for the purchase of machines on the instalment plan. He claims that the worship of this god will help anyone to get a sewing machine, though no instances of its successful use are given. He has one image which he calls the god of preachers, and says it has a congregation of three hundred in its stomach. He has one god which he says is inhabited by his own celestial spirit, and another which contains the spirit of his mother.

The god of the Reading Railroad Company occupies a prominent position among his collection. The interior of this god is filled with cabbage, and its particular mission is to keep cows off the track and prevent accidents generally. There is a god of horses filled with hay and oats, a god of fruit filled with apples, a god of the weather that regulates storms and floods, a god of watermelons, a god of truth, which is in the shape of a hand, and gods which represent almost everything imaginable.

He has these images set up on shelves in his cellar and his garret, and worships them continually according to his needs. His name is William Christoph Clemmer, and his house is at 614 Locust street, where he livs with his wife and six children. He is a brickmaker by trade, and works regularly at one of the brickyards of the city, occupying all of his spare time with his idols, which he fashions out of clay obtained at the brickyard. He is a Pennsylvania Dutchman and cannot speak English, is unlettered, and can scarcely read, so that all his strange ideas about the deities which he worships are evolved from his own imagination. A great many of his gods are supposed to contain the spirits of his friends, living and dead, but he has gods also which represent those whom he considers his enemies. These he has set apart by themselvs, and they are treated with great deference and consideration, so as to placate them and ward off as much as possible any harm they may intend toward him.

Clemmer's mania does not seem to interfere at all with his regular occupations, though the purchase of food for them cuts down somewhat the supply for his family. He is allowed to hav his way in the matter, however, lest if he should be thwarted he might become violent. The images are very rude and inartistic, but there is considerable expression in the faces of some of them, and in all cases the outward lineaments are supposed to be a reflection of the particular spirit within. He has been three years in making the collection, and it is his ambition to build a temple on Mount Penn as a permanent home for his deities, where they can be worshiped and consulted by everybody. He pretends that he has revelations every day from some of his gods, and that they regulate every action of his life and tell him what to do in every emergency.

Clemmer allows no one to meddle with the idols when he is not at home, but when he is there he is glad to show and explain them to anyone, and endeavors to impress everyone with his peculiar beliefs, having no doubt that all the world will sooner or later see the necessity of consulting his gods.

More Christs.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., Aug. 30th.—In the northern part of Little River, and also in the county of Sevier, one Elam Irvin, an alleged Mormon missionary, is trying to make people believe that he is the Christ. He says that he is from Manchester, Red River county, Texas. The ignorant portion of the population is greatly exercised over his religious teachings. He tells them in his sermons that he is able to remove mountains, to drink poison with impunity, ward off bullets, and to cure the sick by the laying on of hands. He anoints infants with oil and alleges that they become angels. He says this is his second visit to the earth, and in a few weeks he will be known as Christ himself. His worshipers are increasing rapidly, and they claim to be followers of Christ.

WE solicit all of our readers in the Northwest who can attend the convention of the Oregon state Secular Union to do so. It will be held at Portland, Ore., at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, October 12th, 13th, and 14th. It is aimed to hav the convention participated in not by Oregon Freethinkers alone, but by those of Washington also, and even, if possible, by those of all the new states. The object is to secure the total separation of church and state. Liberal orators and workers of every kind will be there. Surely the noble efforts just put forth by many Freethought veterans in the new states will induce in all a desire to meet and see those workers for us, and grasp their hands. Contributions, and communications of all kinds, will be received by the board of directors, C. Beal, A. F. Neunert, J. K. Sears, Lee Laughlin, L. Ames.

TO

"AGNOSTICISM AND OTHER ESSAYS,"* BY EDGAR FAWCETT.

I.

EDGAR FAWCETT.

Edgar Fawcett—a great poet, a metaphysician and logician—has been for years engaged in exploring that strange world wherein are supposed to be the springs of human action. He has sought for something back of motivs, reasons, fancies, passions, prejudices, and the countless tides and tendencies that constitute the life of man.

He has found some of the limitations of mind, and knows that beginning at that luminous center called consciousness, a few short steps bring us to the prison wall where vision fails and all light dies. Beyond this wall the eternal darkness broods. This gloom is "the other world" of the supernaturalist. With him, real vision begins where the sight fails. He reverses the order of nature. Facts become illusions, and illusions the only realities. He believes that the cause of the image, the reality, is behind the mirror.

A few centuries ago the priests said to their followers: The other world is above you; it is just beyond where you see. Afterward the astronomer with his telescope looked, and asked the priests: Where is the world of which you speak? And the priests replied: It has receded—it is just beyond where you see.

As long as there is "a beyond" there is room for the priests' world. Theology is the geography of this beyond.

Between the Christian and the Agnostic there is the difference of assertion and question—between "There is a God" and "Is there a God?" The Agnostic has the arrogance to admit his ignorance, while the Christian from the depths of humility impudently insists that he knows.

Mr. Fawcett has shown that at the root of religion lies the coiled serpent of fear, and that ceremony, prayer, and worship are ways and means to gain the assistance or soften the heart of a supposed deity. He also shows that as man advances in knowledge he loses confidence in the watchfulness of providence and in the efficacy of prayer.

II.

SCIENCE.

The savage is certain of those things that cannot be known. He is acquainted with origin and destiny, and knows everything except that which is useful. The civilized man, having outgrown the ignorance, the arrogance, and the provincialism of savagery, abandons the vain search for final causes, for the nature and origin of things.

In nearly every department of science man is allowed to investigate, and the discovery of a new fact is welcomed, unless it threatens some creed.

Of course there can be no advance in a religion established by infinit wisdom. The only progress possible is in the comprehension of this religion.

For many generations what is known under a vast number of disguises and behind many masks as the Christian religion has been propagated and preserved by the sword and bayonet—that is to say, by force. The credulity of man has been bribed and his reason punished. Those who believed without the slightest question, and whose faith held evidence in contempt, were saints; those who investigated were dangerous, and those who denied were destroyed.

Every attack upon this religion has been made in the shadow of human and divine hatred—in defiance of earth and heaven. At one time Christendom was beneath the ignorant feet of one man, and those who denied his infallibility were heretics and Atheists. At last a protest was uttered. The right of conscience was proclaimed, to the extent of making a choice between the infallible man and the infallible book. Those who rejected the man and accepted the book became in their turn as merciless, as tyrannical and heartless, as the followers of the infallible man. The Protestants insisted that an infinitly wise and good God would not allow criminals and wretches to act as his infallible agents.

Afterward a few protested against the infallibility of the book, using the same arguments against the book that had formerly been used against the pope. They said that an infinitly wise and good God could not be the author of a cruel and ignorant book. But those who protested against the book fell into substantially the same error that had been fallen into by those who had protested against the man. While they denounced the book, and insisted that an infinitly wise and good being could not hav been its author, they took the ground that an infinitly wise and good being was the creator and governor of the world.

Then was used against them the same argument that had been used by the Protestants against the pope and by the Deists against the Protestants. Attention was called to the fact that nature is as cruel as any pope or any book—that it is just as easy to account for the destruction of the Canaanites consistently with the goodness of Jehovah as to account for pestilence, earthquake, and flood consistently with the goodness of the god of Nature.

The Protestant and Deist both used arguments against the Catholic that could in turn be used with equal force against themselvs. So that there is no question among intelligent people as to the infallibility of the pope, as to the inspiration of the book, or as to the existence of the Christian's God—for the conclusion has been reached that the human mind is incapable of deciding as to the origin and destiny of the universe.

For many generations the mind of man has been traveling in a circle. It accepted without question the dogma of a first cause—of the existence of a creator—of an infinit mind back of matter, and sought in many ways to define its ignorance in this behalf. The most sincere worshipers hav declared that this being is incomprehensible—that he is "without body, parts, or passions"—that he is infinitly beyond their grasp—and at the same time hav insisted that it was necessary for man not only to believe in the existence of this being, but to love him with all his heart.

Christianity having always been in partnership with the state—having controled kings and nobles, judges and legislators—having been in partnership with armies and with every form of organized destruction—it was dangerous to discuss the foundation of its authority. To speak lightly of any dogma was a crime punishable by death. Every absurdity has been bastioned and barricaded by the power of the state. It has been protected by fist, by club, by sword and cannon.

For many years Christianity succeeded in substantially closing the mouths of its enemies, and lived and flourished only where investigation and discussion were prevented by hypocrisy and bigotry. The church still talks about "evidence," about "reason," about "freedom of conscience" and the "liberty of speech," and yet denounces those who ask for evidence, who appeal to reason, and who honestly express their thoughts.

To-day we know that the miracles of Christianity are as pueril and false as those ascribed to the medicin-men of Central Africa or the Fiji islanders, and that the "sacred scriptures" hav the same claim to inspiration that the Koran has or the Book of Mormon—no less, no more. These questions hav been settled and laid aside by free and intelligent people. They hav ceased to excite interest; and the man who now really believes in the truth of the Old Testament is regarded with a smile—looked upon as an aged child—still satisfied with the lullabies and toys of the cradle.

III.

MORALITY.

It is contended that without religion—that is to say, without Christianity—all ideas of morality must of necessity perish, and that spirituality and reverence will be lost.

What is morality?

Is it to obey without question, or is it to act in accordance with perceived obligation? Is it something with which intelligence has nothing to do? Must the ignorant child carry out the command of the wise father—the rude peasant rush to death at the request of the prince?

Is it impossible for morality to exist where the brain and heart are in partnership? Is there no foundation for morality except punishment threatened or reward promised by a superior to an inferior? If this be true, how can the superior be virtuous? Cannot the reward and the threat be in the nature of things? Can they not rest in consequences perceived by the intellect? How can the existence or non-existence of a deity change my obligation to keep my hands out of the fire?

The results of all actions are equally certain, but not equally known, not equally perceived. If all men knew with perfect certainty that to steal from another was to rob themselvs, larceny would cease. It can not be said too often that actions are good or bad in the light of consequences, and that a clear perception of consequences would control actions. That which increases the sum of human happiness is moral; that which diminishes the sum of human happiness is immoral. Blind, unreasoning obedience is the enemy of morality. Slavery is not the friend of virtue. Actions are neither right nor wrong by virtue of what men or gods can say; the right or wrong livs in results—in the nature of things, growing out of relations violated or caused.

Accountability livs in the nature of consequences—in their absolute certainty—in the fact that they cannot be placated, avoided, or bribed.

The relations of human life are too complicated to be accurately and clearly understood, and, as a consequence, rules of action vary from age to age. The ideas of right and wrong change with the experience of the race, and this change is wrought by the gradual ascertaining of consequences—of results. For this reason the religion of one age fails to meet the standard of another, precisely as the laws that satisfied our ancestors are repealed by us; so that, in spite of all efforts, religion itself is subject to gradual and perpetual change.

The miraculous is no longer the basis of morals. Man is a sentient being—he suffers and enjoys. In order to be happy he must preserve the conditions of well-being—must liv in accordance with certain facts by which he is surrounded. If he violates these conditions the result is unhappiness, failure, disease, misery.

Man must hav food, roof, raiment, fireside, friends—that is to say, prosperity; and this he must earn—this he must deserve. He is no longer satisfied with being a slave, even of the infinit. He wishes to perceive for himself, to understand, to investigate, to experiment; and he has at last the courage to bear the consequences that he brings upon himself. He has also found that those who are the most religious are not always the kindest, and that those who hav been and are the worshipers of God enslave their fellow-men. He has found that there is no necessary connection between religion and morality.

Morality needs no supernatural assistance—needs neither miracle nor pretense. It has nothing to do with awe, reverence, credulity, or blind, unreasoning faith. Morality is the highway perceived by the soul, the direct road, leading to success, honor, and happiness.

The best thing to do under the circumstances is moral.

The highest possible standard is human. We put ourselvs in the places of others. We are made happy by the kindness of others, and we feel that a fair exchange of good actions is the wisest and best commerce. We know that others can make us miserable by acts of hatred and injustice, and we shrink from inflicting the pain upon others that we hav felt ourselvs: this is the foundation of conscience.

If man could not suffer, the words right and wrong could never hav been spoken.

The Agnostic, the Infidel, clearly perceives the true basis of morals, and so perceiving, he knows that the religious man, the superstitious man, caring more for God than for his fellows will sacrifice his fellows, either at the supposed command of his God, or to win his approbation. He also knows that the religionist has no basis for morals except these supposed commands. The basis of morality with him lies not in the nature of things, but in the caprice of some deity. He seems to think that, had it not been for the Ten Commandments, larceny and murder might hav been virtues.

IV.

SPIRITUALITY.

What is it to be spiritual?

Is this fine quality of the mind destroyed by the development of the brain? As the domain wrested by science from ignorance increases—as island after island and continent after continent are discovered—as star after star and constellation after constellation in the intellectual world burst upon the midnight of ignorance, does the spirituality of the mind grow less and less? Like morality, is it only found in the company of ignorance and superstition? Is the spiritual man honest, kind, candid?—or dishonest, cruel, and hypocritical? Does he say what he thinks? Is he guided by reason? Is he a friend of the right?—the champion of the truth? Must this splendid quality called spirituality be retained through the loss of candor? Can we not truthfully say that absolute candor is the beginning of wisdom?

To recognize the finer harmonies of conduct—to liv to the ideal—to separate the incidental, the evanescent, from the perpetual—to be enchanted with the perfect melody of truth—open to the influences of the artistic, the beautiful, the heroic—to shed kindness as the sun sheds light—to recognize the good in others, and to include the world in the idea of self—this is to be spiritual.

There is nothing spiritual in the worship of the unknown and unknowable, in the self-denial of a slave at the command of a master whom he fears. Fastings, prayings, mutilations, kneelings, and mortifications are either the results of, or result in, insanity. This is the spirituality of Bedlam, and is of no kindred with the soul that finds its greatest joy in the discharge of obligation perceived.

V.

REVERENCE.

What is reverence?

It is the feeling produced when we stand in the presence of our ideal, or of that which most nearly approaches it—that which is produced by what we consider the highest degree of excellence.

The highest is reverenced, praised, and admired without qualification. Each man reverences according to his nature, his experience, his intellectual development. He may reverence Nero or Marcus Aurelius, Jehovah or Buddha, the author of Leviticus or Shakspere. Thousands of men reverence John Calvin, Torquemada, and the Puritan fathers; and some hav greater respect for Jonathan Edwards than for Captain Kidd.

A vast number of people hav great reverence for anything that is covered by mold, or moss, or mildew. They bow low before rot and rust and adore the worthless things that hav been saved by the negligence of oblivion. They are enchanted with the dull and fading daubs of the old masters, and hold in contempt those miracles of art, the paintings of to-day. They worship the ancient, the shadowy, the mysterious, the wonderful. They doubt the value of anything they understand.

The creed of Christendom is the enemy of morality. It teaches that the innocent can justly suffer for the guilty, that consequences can be avoided by repentance, and that in the world of mind the great fact known as cause and effect does not apply.

It is the enemy of spirituality, because it teaches that credulity is of more value than conduct, and because it pours contempt upon human love by raising far above it the adoration of a phantom.

It is the enemy of reverence. It makes ignorance the foundation of virtue. It belittles the useful, and cheapens the noblest of the virtues. It teaches man to liv on mental alms, and glorifies the intellectual pauper. It holds candor in contempt, and is the malignant foe of mental manhood.

VI.

EXISTENCE OF GOD.

Mr. Fawcett has shown conclusivly that it is no easier to establish the existence of an infinitly wise and good being by the existence of what we call "good" than to establish the existence of an infinitly bad being by what we call "bad."

Nothing can be surer than that the history of this world furnishes no foundation on which to base an inference that it has been governed by infinit wisdom and goodness. So terrible has been the condition of man that religionists in all ages hav endeavored to excuse God by accounting for the evils of the world by the wickedness of men. And the fathers of the Christian church were forced to take the ground that this world had been filled with briers and thorns, with deadly serpents and with poisonous weeds, with disease and crime and earthquake and pestilence and storm, by the curse of God.

The probability is that no God has cursed, and that no God will bless, this earth. Man suffers and enjoys according to conditions. The sun shines without love, and the lightning blasts without hate. Man is the providence of man.

Nature givs to our eyes all they can see, to our ears all they can hear, and to the mind what it can comprehend. The human race reaps the fruit of every victory won on the fields of intellectual or physical conflict. We hav no right to expect something for nothing. Man will reap no harvest the seeds of which he has not sown.

The race must be guided by intelligence, must be free to investigate, and must hav the courage and the candor not only to state what is known, but to cheerfully admit the limitations of the mind.

No intelligent, honest man can read what Mr. Fawcett has written and then say that he knows the origin and destiny of things—that he knows whether an infinit being exists or not—that he knows whether the soul of man is or is not immortal.

In the land of ——, the geography of which is not certainly known, there was for many years a great dispute among the inhabitants as to which road led to the city of Miragia, the capital of their country, and known to be the most delightful city on the earth. For fifty generations the discussion as to which road led to the city had been carried on with the greatest bitterness, until finally the people were divided into a great number of parties, each party claiming that the road leading to the city had been miraculously made known to the founder of that particular sect. The various parties spent most of their time putting up guide-boards on these roads and tearing down the guide-boards of others. Hundreds of thousands had been killed, prisons were filled, and the fields had been ravaged by the hosts of war.

One day, a wise man, a patriot, wishing to bring peace to his country, met the leaders of the various sects and asked them whether it was absolutely certain that the city of Miragia existed. He called their attention to the facts that no resident of that city had ever visited them and that none of their fellow-men who had started for the capital had ever returned, and modestly asked whether it would not be better to satisfy themselvs beyond a doubt that there was such a city, adding that the location of the city would determin which of all the roads was the right one.

The leaders heard these words with amazement. They denounced the speaker as a wretch without morality, spirituality, or reverence, and thereupon he was torn in pieces ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

The Two Valley Falls Editors.

Stephen Pearl Andrews was one of the few men large enough to be on both sides, all round a question at once, and equally right at every point. I carefully read to the Wordocrats here what you say in THE TRUTH SEEKER, August 3d, of the Walker-Harman "division," and noted especially your sentence, "Our sympathies are entirely with both of these gentlemen." But there is no "division," only as in the falling of a dead leaf from that sturdy oak of free speech in Kansas, Moses Harman, editor and publisher of Lucifer. In Fair Play, July 20th, Walker committed editorial suicide, pen-shot himself. The Francis E. Abbot of to-day (after all his brave timely words for free speech), what he now says, considering its relation to Mr. Harman and the pending case, is more reprehensible than what Abbot said versus "Cupid's Yokes," Bennett, me, or other of the earlier "offenders." Of course, it is his right to say what shall appear in Fair Play, but where did he get the right to lecture us as to what we conclude to print. What he says of "principles" is pointless bosh; for his "leader," downward and backward, is an abandonment of every principle of liberty which Comstock aims to suppress. As to "policy," nothing could be more impolitic than the two-faced evasion which he now "edits." Is it the laggards, the camp followers, or the pioneers, the scouts, who protect armies? One may sometimes stoop to conquer, but dirt-eating, to appease a foul enemy, is not an encouraging spectacle. Not sinuous cowardice but truth in plain words, clear-cut sense, commands the respect and directs the action of judges and juries.

If ever a man was judiciously serviceable, if ever one incarnated wise evolutionary enterprise, Mr. Harman was, is, and does. Yet a fallen leaf preaches "duty" to him! Of course, we all wish and work to hav the three indicted Lucifer-ites acquitted; but that is a secondary consideration when compared with the great issues of personal health and free expression now pending. Lucky indeed is it for the people and human progress that Mr. Harman is one of "the elect" few who do, by impulse, what serves all and forever. Thanks to the beneficent destiny which he personates, the writings of Markland, Anthony, Whitehead, "Diana," Slenker, and other clean-minded exponents of sex intelligence. hav wrought mightily for good in the columns of Lucifer. By all means, let him hav our good-speed, however slow and far behind we may follow. Arnold Winkelried, gathering a sheaf of Austrian bayonets into his own breast to open a path for Swiss soldiers; Joseph Warren on Bunker Hill; John Brown at Harper's Ferry; Garrison's "I will not retreat, I will not equivocate;" D. M. Bennett publicly saying, after the dastardly assault on him, Josephine Tilton, and W. S. Bell for selling "Cupid's Yokes" at Watkins, "I will sell the book delivered in hand or send it by mail," to vindicate citizen right foully profaned by lewd obscenists—such is Moses Harman, now in the battle for healthy expression, physiological growth, and intelligent purity. The Value of Witness to the Miraculous.

Professor Huxley continues, in the English reviews, his warfare with Christians over the truthfulness of the gospels. His latest article is published in the Nineteenth Century, and is entitled, "The Value of Witness to the Miraculous." We will not reproduce the whole of his argument, with the perhaps too recondite and minute details into which he enters, but will extract the more valuable parts for our readers.

The professor enters at length into the consideration of certain relations of miracles said to hav been performed by the relics of Saints Marcellinus and Petrus. The relater of these miracles is the historian Eginhard, born about A.D. 770. The Protestant world accepts much of the historical writing of this Eginhard, but refuses credence to his testimony on the miracles. After detailing all this, the professor says:

> The readers of this review are, I imagin, very largely composed of people who would be shocked to be regarded as anything but enlightened Protestants. It is not unlikely that those of them who hav accompanied me thus far may be disposed to say: "Well, this is all very amusing as a story; but what is the practical interest of it? We are not likely to believe in the miracles worked by the spolia of SS. Marcellinus and Petrus, or by those of any other saints in the Roman calendar."
> The practical interest is this: If you do not believe in these miracles, recounted by a witness whose character and competency are firmly established, whose sincerity cannot be doubted, and who appeals to his sovereign and other contemporaries as witnesses of the truth of what he says, in a document of which a MS. copy exists, probably dating within a century of the author's death, why do you profess to believe in stories of a like character which are found in documents, of the dates and of the authorship of which nothing is certainly determined, and no known copies of which come within two or three centuries of the events they record? If it be true that the four gospels and the Acts were written by Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John, all that we know of these persons comes to nothing in comparison with our knowledge of Eginhard; and not only is there no proof that the traditional authors of these works wrote them, but very strong reasons to the contrary may be alleged. If, therefore, you refuse to believe that "Wiggo" was cast out of the possessed girl on Eginhard's authority, with what justice can you profess to believe that the legion of devils were cast out of the man among the tombs of the Gadarenes? And if, on the other hand, you accept Eginhard's evidence, why do you laugh at the supposed efficacy of relics and the saint-worship of the modern Romanists? It cannot be pretended, in the face of all evidence, that the Jews of the year 30, or thereabout, were less imbued with the belief in the supernatural than were the Franks of the year A. D. 800. The same influences were at work in each case, and it is only reasonable to suppose that the results were the same. If the evidence of Eginhard is insufficient to lead reasonable men to believe in the miracles he relates, a fortiori the evidence afforded by the gospels and the acts must be so.

Another passage reads:

> Paul's strongly marked mental characteristics, displayed in unmistakable fashion in these epistles, are anything but those which would justify us in regarding him as a critical witness respecting matters of fact, or as a trustworthy interpreter of their significance. When a man testifies to a miracle, he not only states a fact, but he adds an interpretation of the fact. We may admit his evidence as to the former, and yet think his opinion as to the latter worthless. If Eginhard's calm and objectiv narrativ of the historical events of his time is no guarantee for the soundness of his judgment where the supernatural is concerned, the fervid rhetoric of the apostle of the gentiles, his absolute confidence in the "inner light," and the extraordinary conceptions of the nature and requirements of logical proof which he betrays in page after page of his epistles, affords still less security.

About Theocracy.

From the Christian Statesman (organ of the God-in-the-Constitution party).

In the protracted discussion of governmental questions growing out of the National Reform movement it is manifest that intelligent men differ widely. Many who oppose the reform charge us with favoring the union of church and state. Especially does this objection arise when we advocate legislation against Sabbath desecration, and when we argue from the example of Nehemiah the Tirshatha. We are told that he was a governor in a theocracy, an alleged dead form of government. The inference is drawn that his example can hav no bearing in a republic.

It is probable that few hav clear and accurate views on this subject; but in times like ours it is well to know the truth and be able to maintain it. I hope the following propositions will help in the investigation:

1. The theocracy of the Hebrew commonwealth was a lawful and a good government. God appointed it for the good of his chosen nation. If good then, why would not a similar theocracy be good now?

2. If there was a union between church and state then, as is generally supposed, and that by divine appointment, too, why would not a similar union be a good thing now?

3. But there was no union of church and state then—no union such as people object to now. In the Hebrew nation the two institutions, the civil and the religious departments, now called church and state, were entirely separate. They co-operated, each in its own department. That is all. They were each independent the one of the other. One had no power over the other as is the case even now in Great Britain. The members of the church were members of the state also; but that did not make a union of the two. The officers of the one were sometimes officers of the other; but that did not unite church and state. President Garfield was a minister of the gospel in the Christian denomination. He held two offices, one in each department. This did not unite church and state. President Harrison is an elder in the Presbyterian church. He holds an office in each department, civil and religious. Who ever alleged that his election to the presidency united church and state? Every member of the United States Senate might be a Christian, or even a minister, or elder, or deacon; and yet the church and state be separate. . . .

4. That the Hebrew commonwealth was a theocracy is true; and rightfully. But it was also a republic. Any righteous government could be, at the same time, both a theocracy and a republic. All governments should be both. The government that God founded under Moses was both theocratic and representativ. The people afterward, in the days of Samuel, clamored for a king, and God gave them Saul, but in anger. Every monarchy, unless it be electiv, is a usurpation; and every republic in which the authority of God is rejected is also a usurpation.

5. Notwithstanding all that has been said, I acknowledge that in the United States such a republican theocracy, or such a theocratic republic, would be impracticable, if not an utter impossibility now, but only or mainly for the reason that all the people are not of one mind or of one religion as were the Hebrews. All should be Christians, but they are not. All should be Protestants, but they are not. All should be of one mind on the question of the Sabbath, but they are not. All should accept the law of God for the rule of action in both church and state, but they do not. And all should acknowledge God and his son, Christ Jesus, the mediator, as supreme ruler; but they do not. These and similar are reasons why we cannot hav what we should hav, a pure republican theocracy; that is, a government in which the will of God would be the supreme law by the consent and vote of the people, and a government in which officers of his choice would be chosen also by the people. No other kind of government is lawful. In the Hebrew commonwealth, the theocracy, the officers were chosen by the people, and God was the supreme ruler also by their own choice. His will was supreme; the people's will law only when in accordance with the divine will. This was God's kind of government. It was good. The same should be now, and no other. All others are usurpation.

Catholics Conquer.

The fight between the Catholics, Protestants, and people of no religious belief in school district No. 3, Kingston, N. Y., resulted in a victory for the Catholics at the special meeting held on the 30th ult. The district is a large one, and on the pretense of accommodating all the pupils one hundred children are taught by three Franciscan brothers in a building owned by and adjacent to St. Mary's Roman Catholic church. This brothers' school gets a regular portion of the public school funds, and it cost over $3,000 to run it last year. The dissatisfied taxpayers say that all the pupils ought to be taught in one place; that the maintenance of the brothers' school is a needless expense, and that the sectarian education there furnished is contrary to the spirit of the public school system and is un-American. The special meeting on the 30th ult. was for the purpose of voting an appropriation to build a schoolhouse capable of accommodating all the pupils in the district. The friends of the Franciscan brothers were out in force, and voted to postpone taking action until January 25th next. By that time many boatmen will be home for the season, and it is safe to say they are mainly in favor of keeping the brothers' school where it is. The Protestants say they will appeal to the state superintendent of education.

There is little time to be lost by us if we wish to defend ourselvs and children against evils that are frightful and deadly. The Catholics are everywhere advancing toward a regular establishment of a systematic education of young foes of America, at our expense. These young men that they turn out of their schools are creatures evil from top to toe. They are evil in every thought, every principle, and every act. They decry reason, revile science, corrupt politics, and fill our jails and almshouses. They are incapable of doing anything right; they introduce discord and ruin into everything they touch. There is trouble for every country in which they exist, trouble for every generation in which they grow up. Here we are manufacturing them to be a curse to our children.

The only way to get rid of them at last and forever is to convert all the Protestants to Freethought, and then with this mass of reason and enlightenment against them the Catholics must become gradually penetrated by truthful principles and in time be Rationalized. As it is now, the Catholics in all their arguments with Protestants meet only a folly just as bad as their own, and it is no wonder that they never learn anything.

Roads.

While it is true that Rationalistic literature is the best to giv Christians the knowledge they need on the disastrous effects of their religion in the old times when it was strongly believed, yet if they would read any literature much they would obtain this knowledge there. If they could only be got to read much of anything—to be thoroughly educated—they would learn the truth. For it is impossible to trace the course of any department of human effort through the last two thousand years without being at once struck by the immense gap in progress that is marked by the rise of Christianity and extends to the supplanting of that religion by Rationalism. We are brought to this reflection by looking over a work just translated from the French which givs an account of how a certain class of human efforts fared through that Christian period. That class of efforts are the efforts to maintain avenues of transportation and intercommunication, that is, roads. Nothing could be more important. In this matter, the maintenance of avenues through which knowledge of other sections than one's own little locality, and civilizing influences generally, could pass, the Christian ages are, of course, found deficient, as in everything else. The author is not prominent as an Antichristian, or writing from a specially Antichristian point of view, but simply finds here what each historical investigator finds in each field—the decay and ruin of every branch of human welfare and progress under the anti-natural influence of the Christian religion.

The author, M. Jusserand, shows in a general way the magnitude of the part played by the highways during the period treated of. In fact, the highways were the arteries, not only of commerce, but of intellectual fermentation. They discharged the functions now performed by the railway, mail, press, and telegraph. As to the maintenance of these highways and bridges, neglect was the general rule and spasmodic repair the exception. The splendid example of the Roman road-builders was not followed. In theory it was the duty of the people who lived along a road to repair it. In fact, they never did so when they could avoid it. It was the same with bridges. These were often nominally maintained by some noble or ecclesiastic, who appropriated the revenues and allowed the structure to fall into decay. When London Bridge had partly fallen down, in the fourteenth century, the king appealed piteously to his liege subjects throughout the country to subscribe for the needed repairs, but with small success; the good folk of London itself do not appear to hav troubled themselvs about the matter, though the bridge was one of their indispensable avenues. How could it be expected that they would, when during all this period their attention was almost entirely engrossed in preparations for a fabled country beyond the clouds? Often a bridge would break down completely. Then a ferry would be established, and might remain in use for several years before the bridge was put in order. The roads were impassable in winter, and very heavy in summer. Once the Parliament had been summoned for a given date, and when it arrived nobody was present; the members were all detained by the fearful state of the roads. Travel generally was on horseback at the time. There were a few family coaches, enormous wagon-like affairs, looking like sections of huge water-mains, and mounted on springless beds and creaking, clumsy wheels. Those who rode in them were so sorely jolted that the saddle was preferred even by weak women and sick men. Travel was a serious business then in many respects. While on the highway the traveler ran the risk of robbers—a very grave one—for the woods and side country swarmed with outlaws, and the retainers of lawless, pillaging knights and nobles; he might at any time be bagged; he was exposed to all kinds of weather, and instead of finding a comfortable, well-plenished inn at the fall of night, he was liable to end his day's journey before some dilapidated ale-house, which could afford him no better accommodation than a chance to pig with a dozen other strong-flavored wayfarers in wet and stinking straw. So we see here, as everywhere else, the ill effects of the Christian anti-natural faith. Before that faith had risen, the pagan Romans established magnificent roads in every country they entered, and forwarded intercourse and commerce, and with them civilization. After that faith commenced its decline, modern Rationalistic civilization began to lay the great avenues of communication we now see. In the gap between these two eras, while the Christian faith absorbed all man's thought and effort, things were as we hav been showing.

The learned author describes the classes of travelers who used these roads, and we may usefully giv some attention to his testimony and opinion regarding one of these classes. We mean the class of the pardoners, those brazen rogues whose shameless impostures are now attempted to be covered in the school histories that the Catholics are endeavoring to foist upon our youth. We believe that no attempt has been made to estimate the amount of treasure these people wrung from medieval Europe, but it cannot be questioned that the harvests were abundant. As M. Jusserand shrewdly observes, even those who were most skeptical of the pardoner's powers, felt lingering and no doubt influential doubt as to the possible spiritual capacity of the priestly office; for the church had impressed herself profoundly upon the age, and not even the hideous corruption which was paralyzing and degrading her could destroy the old spell of her supernatural potencies. The theory of "the treasury," upon which the proceedings of the pardoners rested, was fully set forth in a bull of Pope Clement VI. in the year 1350. He explained, to quote M. Jusserand, "that the merits of Christ are infinit, and the merits of the Virgin and the saints are superabounding. This excess of unemployed merit has been constituted into a treasury; not one that is deposited in a strong room, or concealed in a field, but which is to be usefully distributed to the faithful, through the blessed Peter, keeper of heaven's gates, and his successors." However largely employed, there ought to be "no fear of an absorption or a diminution of this treasury, first on account of the infinit merits of Christ, as has been said before, then because the more numerous are the people reclaimed through the use of its contents the more it is augmented by the additions of their merits." To insure the distribution of this spiritual wealth the church employed friars and clerks to go about, authorized by official letters, offering to exchange any part of the contents of the "treasury" against more tangible money or goods. The agents thus empowered were the so-called pardoners, and they drove a thriving trade for a considerable period. Naturally—perhaps inevitably—as the business extended, its scope was enlarged, and presently it was not only possible to secure immunity for any crimes already committed, but indulgences were sold for sins to be perpetrated. Also quite naturally many pardoners grew tired of keeping accounts of their receipts and turning them over to the church, and went into business for their own sole advantage. Seeing, moreover, how easy it was to pretend the possession of ecclesiastical authority for the sake of indulgences, many of the bolder spirits dispensed with credentials altogether, and found their profit in greater freedom. The pope was driven to denounce these free traders, of whom he asserted that "they proclaim to the faithful and simple people the real or pretended authorization which they hav received, and irreverently abusing those which are real, in pursuit of infamous and hateful gain, consummate their impudence by attributing to themselvs false and pretended authorization of this kind." It is noticeable that there was nothing "infamous and hateful" about the pursuit of gain so long as the gain was transferred to the coffers of the church.

This evidence on these two subjects, roads and pardoners, seems to be about all that we can profitably gather for our readers from the volume of M. Jusserand.

The Masons and God.

Masonic circles hav had a genuin sensation in the resignation of Past M. G. Commander William H. Peckham, thirty-third degree, as a member of Cerneau Consistory, No. 1, thirty-second degree, of New York city. By this action Mr. Peckham severs his connection with Scottish Rite Masonry. This is the most important event in Masonic history that has occurred for many years. His resignation was declared to be on account of the alleged affiliation of the Supreme Council of the body with the Grand Orient, of France, which does not recognize the existence of a personal God. This Grand Orient, of France, expunged the name of God from its constitution in 1878. Thereupon the symbolic lodges throughout the world severed all relations of amity and correspondence with that body. Mr. Peckham's letter of resignation was addressed "To the Masonic Fraternity throughout the World." In it he says: "The dogmas and ethics of Masonry are inspirations emanating from 'our father who art in heaven.' All Masons, wherever found, express their belief in his divinity and all-ruling power. It is the corner-stone on which the Masonic temple is erected." The wrongful affiliation is constituted by the fact "that Brother F. J. S. Gorgas, the present Grand Commander of the Ancient and Accepted Scottish Rite of the Thirty-third and last degree of Freemasonry, as established in these United States by Joseph Cerneau in New York in 1807, during a visit by him to Paris, France, in 1888, did visit and meet with the Council of the Order, and did appoint one of the obedients of the said Grand Orient a representativ thereto, as a guarantee of amity on behalf of the body over which he, said Gorgas, presides." The conclusion is: "Looking at the matter in all its bearings, I find myself, as a loyal member of symbolic Masonry, constrained to sever my connection with Scottish Rite Masonry, and the Cerneau Consistory, No. 1, thirty-second degree, of this city, and leave my action to the judgment of all conscientious Masons, wheresoever dispersed."

When a body of men of the nature and extensivness of the Masonic order is seen to remain in large part so attached to the myths proper to childhood, so unpenetrated by the lights of modern knowledge, as to maintain as an article of faith a belief in the Jehovah of the ancient Jews, it is clear that we hav a vast work before us.

Buddhism.

The Buddhist, a weekly paper, has been established at Colombo, Ceylon, by Mr. C. W. Leadbeater, an Englishman, for the purpose of expounding and propagating the Buddhist religion. "Its object," as is more precisely explained in the prospectus, "is to bring modern European thought into touch with real, practical Buddhism, and to giv the leaders of the Southern church a channel through which their ideas may be directly communicated to the English-speaking world." It therefore enters the field for the conversion of Christendom to Buddhism as a colaborer of the paper established in Japan for the same purpose. Among its contributors are the High Priest Sumangala, well known to English Buddhists, and Sir Edwin Arnold, of so high a place in English letters. The movement for the propagation of the relig on of Gautama Buddha in the Western world seems, therefore, to be both serious and activ. Also, that religion is obtaining foothold in England and in Boston. The literature of Buddhism is finding its way into American periodicals. We are rather pleased at its spread here, as its merits will show Christians that what they hav been pleased to look down on as inferior heathen beliefs contain not only as much good as their own, but often more. Besides, the greater the number of religions we can get in this country, the better can we obtain religious liberty and fence off the despotism of one. And moreover, the essential philosophy of Buddhism is far superior to that of Christianity, and in its affirmations seems to hav anticipated the conclusions of modern science in a remarkable manner. It is not disfigured with the barbarous Christian fancy of a manlike God, outside of nature, who creates all things and manipulates them continuously for the good of whatever savage band chooses to say it believes in him. The Buddhistic philosophy starts with the conception, similar to that of modern science, of an original chaos, animated by an inherent force into the teeming diversified forms of the present. It assumes as the first cause of all things the substance Prakriti, that is, original nature, one and indestructible, in which dwell the opposing forces of rest and activity. These forces produce the continually repeated destruction and metamorphosis of all that exists. This view is distinctly scientific. Not the least merit of this religion is a morality of the highest order. Among the admirable moral sayings and precepts of Buddha are the following:

"If one man conquer in battle a thousand times a thousand men, and if another conquer himself, he is the greatest of conquerors. One's own self, conquered, is better than all other people; not even a god could change into defeat the victory of a man who has vanquished himself, and always livs under restraint. By oneself the evil is done, by oneself one suffers, by oneself evil is left undone, by oneself one is purified. Purity and impurity belong to oneself; no one can purify another.

"Cut out the love of self like an autumn lotus, with thy hand. Cherish the road to peace.

"If a man does what is good, let him do it again; let him delight in it; happiness is the outcome of good.

"Let no man think lightly of evil, saying in his heart, it will not come over me. Even by the falling of water-drops a water-pot is filled; the fool becomes full of evil, even if he gathers it little by little.

"Let no man think lightly of good, saying in his heart, it will not benefit me. Even by the falling of water-drops a water-pot is filled; the wise man becomes full of good, even if he gathers it little by little.

"Let a man overcome anger with love, let him overcome evil by good, let him overcome the greedy by liberality, the liar by truth.

"Not to commit any sin, to do good, and to purify one's mind, that is the teaching of the Awakened. Not to blame, not to strike, to liv restrained under the law, to be moderate in eating, and to dwell on the highest thoughts, this is the teaching of the Awakened.

"He who is thoughtful, blameless, dwells alone, does his duties, is free from desires, has attained the highest end—him I call indeed a Brahmana.

"He who is tolerant with the intolerant, mild with the faultfinders, free from passions among the passionate—him I call indeed a Brahmana."

Our readers no doubt appreciated the excellent poem we printed last week by the eminent Sir Edwin Arnold, exhibiting "Buddhist Morality."

Editorial Notes.

CHUROH creeds are going. Hereafter ministers of the church of Scotland are simply to own the Confession's "doctrin," instead of its "whole doctrin," to be the true doctrin, and elders are merely to "approve" of the Confession.

DELAWARE, the whipping-post state, has had its pure and tender feelings shocked by a heinous crime committed by a citizen of Wilmington. The crime consisted in selling ice-cream on Sunday. The city magistrates refused to take cognizance of the case and the public prosecutor laughed at it, but the truly good will nevertheless push their efforts to hav the iniquitous thing stopped.

IN Canada Christianity is doing what it always does whenever it can get itself fervently believed. It is generating strife and anarchy, and preventing common agreement on civil affairs and thus retarding the development of the nation. A representativ man of Canada says the question must be settled now whether Rome is to rule the country or not. "If it is not settled with ballots by us," he says, "our children will hav to settle it with bayonets."

"FRITANKAREN. Organ för Sveriges Fritänkare. Viktor E. Lennstrand och Alfred Lindkvist. No. 1." Out of these characters, at the head of a good-sized journal that we hav received, we are smart enough to make out that this is a Freethought paper started by the heroic Victor Lennstrand and Alfred Lindkvist. And making out merely this is sufficient to fill us with a very considerable joy, for is it not an excellent thing to see a start made in the abolition of superstition in those backward Scandinavian countries? "Huru skall statskyrkan störtas?" reads the heading to the first article. Yes, those are our sentiments, we will say to that, as the comic character says in the play when he has heard something he does not understand. But we do not speak so at random, for the source is an incontestable warrant that the sentiment must be a good one.

IT was discovered the other morning that during the night some one had entered St. Patrick's Roman Catholic church at Huntingdon, N. Y., and carried away almost everything of value. Every drawer in the vestibule had been opened and ransacked. The altar had been entered, and the altar light had been taken from its place and carried about the church to aid in the search after valuables. The silver communion service and all the valuable plate and altar paraphernalia were missing. The valuable chalices that had been presented to Father Crowley were also gone. Our conjecture on this matter is that the person who did all this may be some taxpayer forced to take this means of obtaining his own again. History shows that nations that allowed church property to accumulate untaxed always had to reclaim it again by force when it got too prodigious. We suppose the man thought it just as rightful to do so on a small scale as on a large.

ON the 25th ult. the emperor of China proceeded to the Ta-kao Tien to offer thanks for the rain that heaven had sent in response to his prayers. God seems to be quite ubiquitous and impartial in his tendance and favors. Heathen emperors we see get what they ask just the same as anyone. What a bedlam these praying people all make, anyway! Hundreds of thousands of people of a thousand different beliefs all praying at once for as many different and conflicting things, and not one seeming to hav power of accurate observation enough to perceive correctly when he gets it and when he doesn't. To add to the confusion and ridiculousness of the situation, those among them whom we hav beat a little science into, one minute express belief that the operations of nature proceed in fixed and undeviating order and the next minute say they hav just changed that fixed and undeviating order with their own puny, miserable little breaths.

THE congregation of Mount Zion Baptist church, Indianapolis, was in court on the 12th ult. for having participated in a general fight in the church. There has been trouble over the pastor, Elder Morton, for some time, the congregation being about equally divided in opposing and supporting him. He was locked out of the church by order of the trustees, and this provoked threats of violence from his followers, but with a view to bringing about an adjustment of the difficulties, the elder was induced to tender his resignation. Elder Williams was brought to the church to conduct services as his successor. One of the deacons got up and declared that he should not occupy the pulpit. The elder replied that he was there to preach the gospel, and he proposed to do so if he had to fight. With this the row began. The pastor's nose was smashed, and a general knock-down followed. Several of the brethren were badly disfigured when they appeared in court. The contending factions swore out warrants for the arrest of each other on charges of assault and battery and disturbing the peace. Here is an example on a small scale of the general relations of the religious and secular elements in all history. The religious disturb the public peace with their interminable dissensions and violence; the principles they boast of are found totally without influence to restrain them; when they are about to annihilate public order altogether the secular force of law and justice has to be called in, and quiet is restored.

THE Rev. George M. Frankin, of Listowel, Ont., writes to the Twentieth Century to know what is the use of being moral, honest, or kind if we know nothing of what is to be after death. How some of those Christians do expose themselvs at times! We will admit that if all Christians were like the Rev. Mr. Frankin we would giv up our work of substituting the sympathy-morality for the reward-morality at once. Fortunately, it is only a minority that hav that abject cur-like heart; most are constituted with those sympathies and principles that prompt to just conduct without requiring pay or threats, and that constitute the true and only genuin moral sense. Even that minority may in time, by the recalling of their attention from the clouds to the pains or joys of their fellow-beings here, be imbued with the true moral sentiment. We do not think it impossible even that a long course of judicious disciplin might make the Rev. George M. Frankin almost a decent man.

M. VYSHNEGRADSKY, minister of finance of Russia, intends to tax the Protestant churches in the Baltic provinces. These churches hav hitherto been exempt from taxation. This is one of a series of reforms by which the government intends to thoroughly Russianize the Baltic German institutions and to diminish the influence of the German Protestant clergy. So says the dispatch. Of course our readers see what is meant. The czar of Russia is merely using the church, as every other tyrant has used it, to further his ends and keep the people in subjection and attachment to him. When each tyrant can hav the church of his country thoroughly of his own views, and teach nothing but attachment to him and his nation, and hatred of every other nation—when he can hav the church concur in repressing international intercourse and assimilation, and in maintaining national separations and hatreds and ignorance, by which his power exists—then he knows that he is intrenched within defenses of strength that history has proved almost invincible.

THE early risers at Sag Harbor, L. I., on a late morning, were horrified to discover a pirate's flag floating from the weathercock on the spire of the Presbyterian church. The flag was of the regulation black and about five feet square. It was emblazoned with crossbones and skull in cardinal red in the center. The attention of the Rev. Mr. Wilson, pastor of the church, was called to the flag, and he was very indignant. How the flag was put up is a deep mystery, as no trace of climbers has been found. An offer of $50 was made to anyone who would take the flag down. It was a very dangerous task, as the steeple is one hundred and eighty feet high. The more we think over this the more delighted we are with the idea. Out of all possible flags, what more appropriate one could hav been found? Plain red, symbolizing the blood the church has shed, would hav been insufficient; rather let us assign her the full design of the pirate, who combines both bloodshed and robbery, and it will most fitly stand for her bloodletting of old and her robbery in stealing our taxes now.

THREE and four hundred years ago Mexico, peopled by the civilized and happy Aztecs, became the unhappy object of irruptions of Christians. Spain, that land preëminent in the faith, furnished the invaders. Soldiers and priests, with swords and crosses, overran the once peaceful land, massacred and tortured most of the nativ and rightful owners, and reduced the survivors to the wretched condition that has made them and their land bywords. Now that Freethought and Liberalism hav gained the ascendency, the old narrow-mindedness of race is waning, and memories of the nation that was destroyed are being recalled with respect. On the 21st ult., there was held at the statue of Cuauhtemoc, paso de La Reforma, City of Mexico, a public ceremony having this character, under the direction of the municipal council. It was the 368th anniversary of the torture of Cuauhtemoc by the Spanish conquerors, who hoped to make the last Aztec emperor divulge the hiding-place of the treasure of the empire. On the north and south sides of the statue two perfect Aztec temples had been erected, and at 9 o'clock, before one of the largest concourses of people ever gathered in the paso, President Diaz and four members of his cabinet arranged to enter the southern edifice to the music of the national anthem. For fully a quarter of a mile along the route the president traversed before entering the temple the broad avenue was lined with soldiers two deep. There were twelve bands present, and civic societies and deputations without number from suburban towns. The exercises consisted of addresses, music, and reading of poems. One of the orators was Governor Prospero Casavantes, of Tlaxcala, who delivered a speech in the nasual or Aztec language. At the conclusion of the municipal program President Diaz placed a wreath of roses upon the statue. This was the signal for others to do so, and the base was within ten minutes buried under garlands representing the varied flowers of the valley, and a value in the United States of thousands of dollars. Nativs dressed in the attire of Aztecs danced about the monument, and the Indians, who were present in thousands, played upon strange instruments and kept up the festivals of three centuries ago, reminding one of the "feast of flowers," so beautifully described by Prescott. Thus the ancient beliefs, comparativly good, that Christianity stamped out when she gained universal power, are everywhere rising again into vigor while she in turn declines.

Letters from Friends.

ARLINGTON, N. Y., Aug. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav taken the paper nine years, and I hav only two papers left. I giv them all away. I do as much good as I can. I think the paper is better every week. My regards to you and Heston and all your readers.

Yours for truth and liberty, J. JONATHAN BASSNETT.

WHATCOM, WASH. TERR., Aug. 11, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: You ask for a correct moral code to be taught in schools. What better do you want than this: Learn, through the medium of the law of cause and effect, that what you are about to say or do can do no one any harm, but, on the contrary, will tend to enlighten and elevate the human race. Respectfully submitted, S. D. REMHART.

SALEM, ILL., Aug. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In this town where priestcraft and hypocrits hold the ruling power, a man of my ideas is looked upon as something fearful to ever behold, to say nothing about dealing with. This town is comparativly dead, and if the truth was told, the answer would be the priests hav killed it. In 1880 there were 1,327 people, now only 1,314. Thus it is, creed-bound and priest-ridden. About ten years since there were ten God-houses here in full blast, but not more than five or six now. Good! While the priests kill the town they kill themselvs also. S. S. S.

NEW YORK, Aug. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I will communicate a little joke I saw last week. It ran as follows: A priest wishing to show the difference between certain denominations, to his flock, as compared with his, took with him into the pulpit a nut. Holding it up in full view he said: "This, the shell, represents the Presbyterian church, hard and dry. The skin is bitter and of no use. It represents the Methodist church. And now I will show you the meat, which represents the Catholic church," breaking the shell at the same time. And horror! it was rotten. I remain, Yours, FRED. C. DYER.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Aug. 17, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 10th was very interesting. Heston's cartoons were, as usual, splendid. The article by Thomas H. Huxley on "Agnosticism and Christianity" is an ably written one, and I regard him as one of the ablest and greatest workers in the cause. Aunt Elmina's sketch of that noble and gifted woman, Frances Wright, is, like all of her other writings, very instructiv and interesting. S. Palmer writes valuable articles. I send best wishes and kindly greeting to the Truth Seeker Company.

Always yours, GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

ST. JOHNS, ARIZ., July 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It does seem ages since we hav made a "mutual call;" nevertheless, I always retain a pleasant remembrance of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and sincerely hope it may liv long and wax fat. Brother Reynolds passed through our Southwest territories last fall, and I had made arrangements for him to lecture at the town of Holbrook, this county, but some unlooked-for events intervened which prevented him from complying, and I and many others were greatly disappointed. Wishing a triumphant success to the cause, I subscribe myself, Yours truly,

ALBERT F. BANTA.

BUFFALO, Aug. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find draft on New York for $3 to pay one year's subscription for TRUTH SEEKER. I hav spent the last seven months in Nevada. I had the paper remailed to me from this place. It helped me to pass many pleasant hours reading it. I hav taken THE TRUTH SEEKER a long time—not less than twenty years, and shall continue to as long as it continues to print both sides of all important subjects. Some of the Materialists giv us Spiritualists pretty hard raps, thinking as they do that all Spiritualists are a set of superstitious fools. As foolish as we are, the Materialists would hav a hard time battling with the church, which would annihilate them in less than a year, were it not for the Spiritualists. I make it a rule as I read THE TRUTH SEEKER to mail it to some one, as well as ten other Liberal and reform papers which I take. I think there is no better way to work reform than to distribute freely good reading matter.

I think Heston's pictures are doing a good work. I always study them first, and notice others do the same to whom I lend my paper. Yours truly, A. H. FRANK.

BYRON, ILL., Aug. 24, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As all people are interested in the future, and are anxious to learn all they can about the views of others on this great question, I would say that I hav made it a study for the past three years or more, and hav concluded to put my views in form, and let the people read and use their own judgment. I am twenty-seven years old, and used to be a strong Christian, and hav made the theme a study both as a Christian and a Liberal, and hav fully decided with the latter party, and shall do what I can to advance the interests of that element. I taught the Bible class in Sunday-school when twenty-three. I had a class of twenty men. But, two years later, when I jumped the track of the heavenly "air line," there was consternation in camp, and a great many of the good sisters and brethren went down on their marrows to implore the "all-wise being" to come down and lift me up to grace again. I would say that this is no case of a drunken fall from grace, but a cool thought, as I hav never used a pint of liquors, of all kinds put together, in my life, and I stand on a strictly temperance base to-day.

If it will be satisfactory to you, and you wish a correspondent on the subject from this corner of the world that was created in six days, then drowned for man's sins, and then brought out in due form again, I will be at your service to drop you a line occasionally. FORCE MITCHELL.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., July 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am a truth seeker and a Republican, and I am with you heart and soul in your comment regarding John Wanamaker. Had I known that Benjamin Harrison would hav appointed the Philadelphia Market street Sheeny in the cabinet of his administration I should never hav voted for him, and now declare that act of Benjamin Harrison will lose him a second nomination as president of these United States. Harrison has proved himself a small man, and the Sheeny Wanamaker will prove it up for him in time. "Birds of a feather will flock together." Harrison, Wanamaker & Co., successors to the old firm of John Calvin & Co., the murderers of Dr. Servetus. John Wanamaker could never be elected by the people even to the position of sheriff of Philadelphia county, and any man that could not be elected to an office by the people never should be appointed postmaster-general of these United States. Go on with the truth, Mr. Editor, and at the next Republican nomination for president you will find Wanamaker, Harrison & Co. will get left. WILLIAM E. HOOPER.

ODESSA, MO., Aug. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: This is Sunday. I am at a secluded farm-house. All hav gone to church. I am alone. I hav not been to church more than a half dozen times in forty years. I detest superstition; am necessarily brought in contact with enough of it to make a sensible man heart-sick without visiting the shops where they manufacture it. I am getting quite old; death is near at hand. A few more years at farthest will bring me to the bourne from whence no traveler returns. My chief consolation is that I hav kept the doors and windows of my mind open to secure light from all directions; that I hav investigated independent of creeds or sectarian prejudice; that I hav reached that elevated plain of thought and action which places me entirely above the silly gabble of priest and minister, from whence I can look down upon their rotten system and see through it as if it was glass perfectly transparent. No fear of eternal torment can ever enter this Freethought heaven. I can lie down and die resigned to my fate. This is my chief consolation, and I would not exchange it for any hope or consolation in the Christian religion. WM. L. WORLEY.

PORTSMOUTH, O., Aug. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: On last Sunday I had the pleasure of grasping my old friend, E. H. DeWitt, by the hand. He is a grand old Liberal, and formerly resided here. He is now located in Cincinnati, at 133 Warsaw Pike, Price's Hill. Many a time hav I listened to his solid argument for the right as against the church, and on several occasions I hav known Catholics to threaten his life. But this good old man never frightened. He never givs an inch, and is always found battling close to the priests' breastworks. Once I knew a Catholic, by name Dennis Conroy, who can't write and I don't think can read, who one night laid for DeWitt with a brick. He swore to put him out of existence, and would, in his ignorant way, call DeWitt a d——d In-fid-el, with the emphasis on the "In" and "fid" syllables. He changed his mind, however, before the fatal moment arrived, and lucky for him that he did.

George S. Oldfield is engaged in the grocery business in this city. He is a high kicker in the Episcopal church—the church which, as Ingersoll puts it, "with a few more ceremonies would be Catholic, and with a few less, nothing." He has a son, Frank Oldfield. He desires this boy to be pious, a believer in the impossible, from his youth up. To convince him he unceremoniously uses the lash, never thinking for a moment that—

> A person convinced against his will,
> Is of the same opinion still.

He has been known to unmercifully beat the boy, and yet the humane officers are as silent as the grave, and the statutes against cruelty lie dormant at the feet of "Justice." Only a few days ago young Oldfield was caught in the storeroom of Fuller Bros.'s undertaking establishment, long after the closing hour. He was caught by the police, was locked up, and got off with a $10 fine. Perhaps a hard beating was thrown in at home as an argument in favor of God, the Episcopalian church, and the Constitution. Portsmouth contains a large number of cruel fathers and a few heartless mothers. And every one of them believes implicitly in the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. They beat their children for nothing, and sing psalms for a harp and a crown.

This city has a mayor whose name is George A. Waller. He is as stubborn as a Jerusalem donkey, and believes in the bastard Catholic doctrin, commonly called Episcopalianism.

He closes the saloons on Sunday, and with them the barber shops, the cigar-stands, etc. Said a prominent citizen: "Mayor Waller is controled by a few old ladies, officered by a fanatical clergy. He has made the town a laughing-stock both at home and abroad. Already one of his lungs has decayed, and with the remaining one, so long as it lasts, he will make a noise, calculated to aid and assist the God-in-the-Constitution party, and the tyrant of all churches." He frequently quotes the law closing saloons on Sunday, and claims it covers the whole ground, takes in all shops. In this he is mistaken, as the law is a mere police enactment, and has been so decided by the supreme court. In the language of a learned and able jurist of this city: "This act provides a penalty for anyone over fourteen years of age performing common labor—mind you, common labor is what is provided for, and the laborer must be over fourteen. So that any boy under fourteen can start a barber shop, and shave all day Sunday without violating the law. Selling a few cigars or tobacco, which, to some men, is a necessary of life, accommodating the people on a hot day with a few cool drinks, or ice cream, is not, strictly speaking, what is meant by the statute forbidding common labor. The supreme court has once had this law under consideration, and declares it to be a mere police regulation, having nothing whatever to do with religious considerations. It is merely an arbitrary setting apart of one day in seven for rest and recreation, thus preventing employers from carrying on their industries in general and forcing laborers to work more than six days in a week. It is always expected that such laws will be enforced with discretion, and a wide latitude is always given officers in such cases. It is not like a law to punish wickedness, like murder, larceny, perjury, etc., where the life, liberty, and property of the citizen are endangered or destroyed. From the very necessities of modern affairs this law is and must be, to a great extent, a dead letter. The steamboats go plowing up and down the river, the trains thunder past, the street cars are in constant motion, the gas that lights the churches has to be made on Sunday, the preacher does his heaviest work on Sunday, the drug clerk must work, and so must the doctors, and so on for quantity too numerous to mention. Yet we cannot lawfully employ a barber unless he is under fourteen years of age, and if we are travelers and do not know how to handle the tools, we must go hairy on Sunday. In that wicked little town on the lake, named Cleveland, the courts hav uniformly held that a lady or gentleman had the right to employ assistance in making their toilet, and, therefore, the work of the barber was a work of necessity and excusable. But in Portsmouth the verdict is: 'Shave yourself or wear hair.'" WILL S. ANDRES.

SAN BERNARDINO, CAL., July 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Christian religion is decidedly a religion of evolution. It should be divided into six epochs: First epoch, the traditional history from Adam to Abraham; second, Abraham to Moses; third, Moses to the captivity; fourth, captivity to Christ; fifth, Christ to the reformation; sixth, reformation to the present day. Upon examination, from age to age it undoubtedly grew better. The history of the religion shows that the seeds of disease and revolution are inherent in itself, which spring up and bring forth fruit, i. e., Christian arrogance, stupidity, pride, and power, which, in turn, bring an outward influence to bear upon it, to crush out the evil—which, in the end, is for the general good of mankind.

To-day the church, in its stupidity and arrogance, is trying to bind our liberties with fetters as of old. For years it has been steadily encroaching upon our freedom, until now we, who prize our country, home, and fireside, must be up and doing.

In the coming war—reason versus Jesus—many of the strongholds of Jesus will be destroyed for the good of humanity. We will not completely subdue. There will be hard work left for our children and their children. We cannot say, as Paine, "Let us hav war, that our children may hav peace," but we can say, Let us hav war that our children may be free. That they need not blush for the memory of their sires. Their religion is all right so long as it does not encroach upon the liberties of the majority. It would make a grindstone blush to hear some of the priestly orators denounce the movements of the Infidel and Atheist. Nature has blushed at the arrogance of man. It is said that—

> Jesus looked upon the water clear,
> For him it blushed with shame,
> That he, without a name,
> Should call himself a God.

Now that Puck has assumed the responsibility to caricature our psalm-singing administration, there will be no fear that the Blair bill will ever become a law. It will go the way of the Prohibition movement in the East. Our Christly administration will soon begin to stink in the land. The Republican party will never again place at the head of the ticket the present saintly incumbent, B. Harrison. They will, most likely, run to the other extreme at the next convention and nominate Col. R. G. Ingersoll as a surprise for the world. They can only save themselvs by some such diplomatic move. He would receive the votes of all the Liberalists except the soreheads who borrow their neighbors' paper and make the biggest kick because it is not run to suit their critical selvs. Some of your contributors are not satisfied with writing for Liberalism, but hav lengthened out and narrowed down to the abuse of our most stanch ally, viz., Spiritualism. If the pen of D. Priestley was engaged in writing on Liberal subjects it would be more conduciv to the good of the cause, than the persecution of a doctrin which claims its millions of adherents. This does the cause no good. It puts the persecuted upon their mettle to defend themselvs, and causes joy in the army of Jesus.

We are presumed to be seeking for the truth and defending the liberty of man. The bigoted and narrow had better join the humble followers of the fatherless man-god, Jesus, or turn their weapon against our common enemy. Our foes hav much to answer for. They hav deluged the earth with blood, shrouded the world in darkness for centuries, and destroyed the learning of ages with the incendiary torch. In addition to the blood, darkness, and fire, they try to compel the acceptance of their wretched Bible, and their God which nature loathes. Let us up and at them with the sword of reason. With the jaw-bone of an ass they defend themselvs. Delve into musty tomes wherever they may be found, bring their cruelties to the light of day. Show up their false doctrins. Make them hide their faces with shame that they should be identified with the blind followers of ignorance and superstition.

The world has cause to curse Christianity. Is there a nation under the sun, civilized or the lowest savage, that has not suffered when brought in contact with Christianity? "I came not to bring peace but a sword," was a truthful remark of Jesus Christ. To-day we might be farther advanced and many an unsettled and vexed question answered satisfactorily —Spiritualism, for instance.

We are now on the eve of a bright and glorious day of freedom and happiness. Shall the sun rise upon the coming day obscured by the bloody clouds of religious fanaticism? We think not. We shall soon be free from the fetters that bind. Science and education will carry us up and onward to the truth. We will look back through the dim vista of ages, and our only regret will be that a jackass did not break the jaw of the fatherless babe when lying in the manger.

W. W. Welsh.

Detroit, July 19, 1889.

Mr. Editor: C. L. James wishes me to explain where my government will be when all law is abolished. I answer first, where it would hav remained if the people had fully understood the intent and meaning of the Declaration of Independence, in hades. I spoke of government in the present sense. The people hav never yet been taught to see that liberty can know no law nor government. When a person is by any process brought under control, his liberty is gone; he is no longer free. He is then a slave. Those who wrote the Declaration of Independence declared that it is a self-evident truth that all persons are by their birth endowed with the right to life, liberty, and to pursue their happiness, and that these rights are inalienable; that there is no power on earth that can rightfully interfere with or alienate those rights from the individual. Then, of course, when the Constitution was adopted and a government formed the people had alienated all those rights, which, according to the Declaration, they had no power or right to do. Now, of course, my friend James will say that I am an Anarchist. But I deny it, and now let me correct another mistake and then I think we will understand each other. Friend James hardly got my meaning about what Anarchists believe. What I wished him to understand was, that in common with the mass of the people, Anarchists hav been educated to believe that the government of this country was formed in accord with the Declaration of Independence, and as even so great a man as Robert Ingersoll teaches us that the Constitution protects every person in their inalienable rights of life, liberty, and happiness. And as any person of good common sense ought to know that it does no such thing, so Anarchism is proposed as likely to do what the Declaration has failed to do. Now, as the declaration that life, liberty, and happiness are the inalienable right of every person born, cannot tolerate a government or control, and as Anarchism means without government or control, I cannot see why I should change from one to the other, and I feel sure that my friend when he takes a good thought over it will say that we are not far apart. But I cannot but feel that Anarchists make a great mistake in taking a name that has long been held in great prejudice, in place of liberty, which has the same meaning to all people that Anarchism has to the few who hold to it. But I hav no fault to find.

And now our friend O. S. Barrett wants to chip in, and says he likes my idea of government issuing all the money, and says in place of national banks hav sub-treasuries, loan money at one per cent. Now, my friend, get that metal out of your head, and do a little solid thinking. How does it sound to say we, the people (who are the government), ask the government (who are the people) to issue two thousand million dollars of legal tender money and loan it to us, the people (who are the government)? No, sir. I do not want the government to loan one dollar to the people nor hav sub-treasuries. Money is just as essential to the existence of civilization and society as the air we breathe is to our bodies, and there should be no lending or borrowing about it. I demand that all taxation shall cease, and that government shall create and issue all money and pay it out for all expense and dues of all kinds, and I demand that government shall not authorize nor recognize anything else as money but its own issue.

Our friend seems to be troubled very much about the questions between Mr. James and myself, but not enough to cause him to try and understand what he reads. He must be getting slightly demented, as he can neither countenance Anarchy, Socialism, nor liberty. He tells the editor very plainly that The Truth Seeker must not allow Anarchy, Socialism, or freedom to be discussed, and now he seems to hav changed his mind about my idea of money, and says that I think the promis to pay of every jackass is good enough. But no, I will excuse him; the others may be good. But here again, as in the other instance, Mr. Barrett does not understand what he reads. I never hav intimated a desire for anyone to issue notes or promises to pay. I desire that the constituted authority of the people at Washington shall create and issue all money, a legal tender, and with it pay all debts and dues and all expenses of government. Hoping that our gentlemanly critic may be able to understand this, allow me to say to Mr. Barrett that we are not so much in love with his old harlot, the church, nor the priest, as to be forever advertising them. We are doing many times more good for our fellow-man than he can do by always fuming at or about them. We are trying to teach all people to accept and adopt their natural rights to liberty, feeling sure that liberty for "all" is the sure death of all superstition and priestcraft.

Ever fraternally for liberty for all, J. H. Wood.

Wilkesbarre, Pa., Aug. 22, 1889.

Mr. Editor: In your issue of July 27, 1889, I read an article from the pen of J. A. Tuttle on the subject of science and planetary motion and Spiritology, which reminded me forcibly of my own notions about science forty years ago, and before I had given the subject much thought.

At that time I met an old gentleman who by some means became interested in my conversation, and was thereby, as he said, attracted to me, and proposed to discuss in a friendly way several things I had alluded to. His object, no doubt, was to enlighten me, and in a kind way giv me some scientific truths which would conflict with my Bible notions about God creation, etc., but owing to my school memory, which tacked a God to every phenomenon of nature, I could not imagin anything unless God did it, so that, although he gave me the most formidable reasons for the opinions advanced by himself, I could not in my blindness see them, and others as ignorant as myself who heard the discussion actually praised me for the able manner in which I had handled the old gentleman. I found out on sober reflection a few days afterward that I had only made a fool of myself, as the longer I reflected on what he said the more it worried me, and convinced me finally that I was all wrong and that he was all right. I met him a month or so afterward and told him so. It pleased him very much, and we had a hearty laugh over it. I hav had occasion often to see myself in the image of other people as they cast themselvs before me.

Mr. Tuttle says he "lost confidence in science in early youth and has not found it yet," and I suggest that because his youth was so early he should hav waited to a more mature age before he cast it off and began to advance theories of his own, which are unsupported by any facts. As an example, he states that it is not true that nature abhors vacuity, or he doubts it, and asserts that outside of the planetary systems and planetary bodies all is vacuity. How does he know this?

Then he states that there is no reason why "all the formations that compose our planet should not hav been simultaneously formed and deposited by the common law of formation and gravitation, etc." How does he know that? What facts has he to support such an absurdity? and in the face, too, of what everyone knows—that all formations are gradual and progressiv.

In the next sentence almost, having talked of the law of formation and gravitation, he says, "I hav failed to find any property in matter such as attraction; . . . hence the attraction of gravitation delusion." What difference has he discovered between attraction and gravitation?

But when he strikes the main object of his scientific dissertation, Spiritualism, then he caps the climax, even knocks himself out in the first round, as the famous slugger Sullivan aims to do. He says: "Nor hav I found any indications of spirit organisms, or of any spirits but the inherent properties of matter that are inseparable from matter." Again: "Spiritology involves the question of whether the facts that are known to exist in nature, or the facts that are known to be manufactured by art, are the most reliable authority on questions of natural phenomena. I would not believe the existence of spirit organisms should I see, hear, and feel them; for I scientifically know them to be delusion, and that my physical senses and imagination are liable to deceive me unless subjected to strict supervision of reason."

Here is a gentleman who claims to understand science, and to be so thoroughly attached to it that he is willing to ignore his own senses of hearing, seeing, and feeling when he meets with phenomena which he has reason to think are not supported by his notions of science, which is an admission that he is not competent to investigate anything outside of his preconceived notions; while, as above shown, he ignores almost every acknowledged fact in science, and sets up speculations and theories about attraction, gravitation, and planetary formation of his own.

If his observations on spirit phenomena are no more reliable than his scientific facts above given, I do not wonder that he is willing to doubt his own senses, only I want no such person to set himself up as my teacher and instructor in science or anything else. No man is competent to teach who ignores his own senses in deference to some preconceived notions about what science teaches. It is his business to make room for new phenomena and account for them, and record them among the facts of nature. It is his business to look, hear, and feel, and judge by his senses, as he does on all matters, and to decide where reality comes in and where the deceptions of art end.

A short time ago at Onset Bay, Mass., Mr. Stansbury produced in public some slate-writing tests which were astonishing. The committee, who were all strangers to him and selected by the president of the meeting indiscriminately from the audience—strangers whom the president did not know; at least, several of them—cleaned off a pair of slates, placing a piece of pencil between them. These slates Mr. Stansbury took and placed on the heads and shoulders of some twenty persons in the audience as he walked around, then taking them back to the committee. On opening them some twenty messages were found written upon them, and the names of spirits signed to each. As the messages were read out and the spirit names given, each person in turn acknowledged that it was for him or her; and a majority of them were not Spiritualists, but were persons attracted to the camp for a day of pleasure. How can this be explained by ignoring one's own senses and those of the whole audience assembled?

Immediately thereafter a beautiful painting was produced on the slates in the same way, the paint of which was green, and no artist could hav made it as well in several hours. Yes; there is no other way. We must accept spirit power or ignore our own wits. And this is what many will do rather than acknowledge the simple truth. J. R. Perry.

St. Joseph, Mich., Aug. 17, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Has God ever made anything perfect? In considering this question, I hope no one will be foolish enough to ask me concerning the subject of the sentence under consideration, as I am Agnostic, never having seen a God myself or known of anyone who has, and all speculations regarding a real deity; his place of residence; his personality; the exact office he fills; whether he rules all things by dictation or by natural law; his character or attributes; his omnipotence or omniscience; whether a God of real love or one subject to the meaner characteristics of man, as hate, revenge, malice, jealousy, etc., being to my mind entirely guesswork, and the decisions not binding upon man in the least degree, for a child can giv its opinion of deity and the more mature in years cannot successfully disprove. In making the assertion that God has never made anything perfect, or rather asking if he has made anything perfect, I do so hoping that some divine who claims to know all about deity—what he has done, is doing, and is going to do—will giv me some information on the subject, but if the divines really know nothing but what they guess at, I cannot accept such as testimony, neither can I accept of the more common evasions of the subject, such as, "God's ways are not man's ways," for I already know that to my sorrow. Neither will it do to say that "God knows best," for such is merely an assertion and no proof. But to the subject—and I do not care to bring up the old scriptures to either prove or disprove anything, as they are already disgraced enough, and I do not wish to show up their fallacies or disprove their authenticity; but will take it for granted that there is a God or gods of some kind, who has created all things, when or how I know not. But I affirm that a poor job has been done in everything undertaken, as I fail to find perfection in any one thing. For where there is perfection there is no need of a change, and science has long since proved that a constant change in everything is the order of the day, even in the millions of planets and their surroundings that revolve in endless space.

We find many beautiful and grand things in nature, and were there no contradictions we should be happy in the thought that the God of nature had perfected everything to his glory, but we see on every hand counteracting testimony to disprove such perfection, for certainly if God has made the rose to bloom in its beauty, he also made the thorns to grow on its stem, and while it may be said that roses can only grow on rosebushes that hav thorns, such reasoning does not prove perfection in a rosebush. The earth on which we liv can be said to be beautiful in the extreme, yet not perfect within or without, for volcanoes and earthquakes disturb its bowels, while tornadoes and destructiv lightning sweep across its surface. The same with man, said to be made from God's pattern. We are in constant turmoil, both within and without, and if we were made perfect we could not hav fallen, as they are contradictory terms. How great are the calamities and beauties of nature intermingled! We walk forth in the early morn in spring with the cerulean canopy over us, and watch the glimmering light of the sunborn tints as they displace the azure of the sky above, while the little warblers from among the branches of the low-spreading juniper are feeding our very soul with the choicest of melody, our feet treading the dewy carpet of green, woven in nature's loom, from the warp and woof of sunshine and shower. While inhaling the pure air of heaven, our whole innate being seems to adore the great source of all things. We wander on, led by the morning light across the pastures, among the little hillocks, where are seen the gentle lambs in their morning frolic, inspired by the gods of their young natures as they hasten to and fro in their delight. We are ready to cry out in ecstasy of joy and "praise God from whom all blessings flow," when lo, a stifled cry of deep fear and suffering is heard. We start, we listen—yes, a cry of pain. We hurry backward to discover the cause. What can it be that has so soon changed the course of our reverie? But look, up the hillside runs with rapid pace a mountain wolf. He has followed the dictates of his nature and has stolen from the fold one of those dear little lambs that was so lately capering in playfulness around the mother ewe—that is now bleating in sorrow, as if asking nature's God to restrain the nature that he has planted with a cruel hand within the voracious brute that has robbed her of her darling that was more to her than the life she possessed. Where now is the God that but a moment before seemed so adorable? Must we conclude that to appreciate a picture of love the camera-obscura of our vision must be forced to depict one of horror? Is this what is known as perfection? Must the vivid lightning kill in order to be more pleasing to the eye in its zigzag course through the sky? Must the mother's little one be torn from her in order to make perfect the tender love and affection for her offspring? Must the mirrored surface of the deep be made turbulent, and swallow up the majestic ship as she is sailing proudly across the great waters, that navigation be perfected? Is it necessary that thousands perish at the stake as heretics to establish a faith in the unknowable? All this is but the result of imperfection, and cannot be attributed to an all-wise, all-merciful, and all-powerful being who desires our adoration, and who will punish in an eternal future his imperfect creatures whose imperfections hav been forced upon them by the laws of an imperfect creation. Better attribute the whole to non-intelligence, and trust that time in its process will evolve the lower and imperfect to a higher level of perfection where all will become worthy the admiration of a future and more perfect race.

Should the crown of our existence be set with rare and beautiful pearls of love and affection, diamonds of peace and tranquillity, rubies of joy and happiness, interspersed with thorns of malice and revenge, sharpened goads of tumult and excitement, and javelins of misery and despair? Is this perfection? This may be necessary in the course of coming events to bring about a more perfect state of affairs, but it does not show perfection now, neither the unlimited power of the great first cause. A. D. Swan.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

The Dead Philosopher.

[This poem was written when my friend, J. H. Cook, was at Snohomish, Wash., where he lived with scarcely a soul to speak to. Said he had fallen down one night and lain on the cold floor a long time, and expected to die all alone some time.—M. B. F.]

He is dead—bring the boon of a tear—
We shared naught while he stayed,
But foolishly weep when death is so near;
While we shudder and half are afraid.
He needs nothing—has nothing to fear—
Come away, he is dead.

He is dead—so grand that few understood,
Though he gave to all men the last of his light—
We would cheer and praise him yet if we could
But he is gone, and now it is night
And lonely and dark is the wood—
We may go—he is dead.

He is dead—tears only mock such as he—
He who has climbed the steep mountain side
And beckoned to us that we might be free.
Yet all alone he has suffered and died
In his cot overlooking the sea;
Do not speak, he is dead.

He is dead—praises are meaningless now,
We may plant a white flower if we will,
Or cast down an evergreen bough
That sweetly has sung to the valley and hill,
Wherefore it sang we know not nor how,
That is all, he is dead.

He is dead—what marble, though fully so white
It be as the true hearts he craved,
What letters of gold if burnished with light,
Or harp in the pine that sang as it waved,
Can tell him what men would to-night,
When, alas! he is dead?

Frenchtown, Neb. MARY BAIRD FINCH.

Their Mother.

My boy sat looking straight into the coals,
From his stool at my feet one day,
And the firelight burnished the curly head,
And painted the cheeks with a dash of red,
And brightened his very eyes, as he said,
In his most confidential way:

"Mamma, I think, when I'm a grown-up man,
I shall hav just two little boys."
I smiled—he was six!—but he did not see,
And I said, "Why, yes, how nice that will be!
But if one were a girl, it seems to me
It would add to your household joys."

"Well—yes," reflectivly, "that would be nice,
And I'll tell you just what I'll do;
I'll name one Robbie, for me, you know,"
Then the bright eyes shone with a deeper glow,
"And there's just the two of us now, and so,
I'll name the girl Annie, for you."

"But how would their mother like that?" I asked,
"Do you think that she would agree
For us to hav both names while she had none?"
With the mystified, puzzled look of one
Wholly befogged, said my logical son,
"Their mother! Why, who is she?"

The Death of a Good Man.

HORACE SEAVER.

The readers of the Corner will hav learned ere this of the death of one of the world's great, good men—Horace Seaver, for half a century editor of the Boston Investigator, the oldest reform journal in this or any other country.

Horace Seaver was a brave and honest man. He was one of the noblest and kindest-hearted men in the world. Tender, considerate, thoughtful for others, gentle and humane, wise and patient under all circumstances, toiling to bless his fellow-creatures, to lift humanity to a higher plane of living and thinking, he was one whose death is a serious loss to his many friends and to the world at large.

He sorrowed over the faults and frailties of others, grieved over the bigotry and superstitions of society, and did his very best to remove them. His gentle heart was moved to pity at the sight of suffering, which he endeavored to relieve to the best of his ability.

He had great charity for the shortcomings of others, and always had a word of praise to bestow wherever and whenever it was deserved. But for shams and hypocrisies he had a righteous indignation and a keen denunciation.

He served humanity with a loyal zeal and as royally as a king. The necessities of the destitute and distressed were the prayers that he answered with substantial aid.

Calling upon one occasion on a sick man in indigent circumstances, he found a clergyman praying at the bedside. After the minister had taken his departure, Mr. Seaver approached the couch of pain, and taking the emaciated hand of the sufferer, he said, "I am not in the habit of praying as the friend who just went out, but here is something that may help to make your troubles a little easier to bear," and a crisp banknote lay before the moistened eyes of the sick one. This was the kind of praying that Mr. Seaver believed in.

On another occasion he was walking down Washington street, in Boston, one snowy, slippery day. The fire-bells sounded an alarm of fire, and the engins came rushing along at full speed. A little child was crossing the street directly in the path of the speeding engin. In another instant she would hav been killed. Mr. Seaver saw at a glance the danger, and at the risk of his own life he snatched the child from a terrible fate. He suffered an injury to his right hand by his brave and daring act from which he never fully recovered. He felt, however, fully rewarded by the escape from sudden death of the child, although he never knew, or sought to know, her name or where she lived.

Such was the beautiful character of the man whose

Actions just
Smell sweet and blossom in the dust.

This lovely and noble life cannot be adequately described in words. It was a credit and honor to all Liberal sentiment and to the highest civilization of the times which his pen and useful living helped to make. He was modest in his manners, pure and chaste in conversation, guileless in habits as a child, and brave as a warrior in the cause of truth and Universal Mental Liberty. He died as he lived, a truthful, honest, self-respecting man.

There are few men who possessed so many virtues, and if he had faults, they were unrevealed to even his most intimate friends.

He has gone, but his many good qualities are as fragrant as flowers, and the example he has left behind will make good men and good women of all who strive to follow it.

A Useful Nut.

The peanut is a useful product—much more so, indeed, than people imagin. We all know how extensivly it is eaten in its roasted state, but therein, by no means, lies the extent of its value. The nuts contain from forty-two to fifty per cent of a nearly colorless, bland, fixed oil, resembling oliv oil, and used for similar purposes. The best is obtained by cold expression, but a large quantity of inferior oil is procured by heating the seeds before pressing. It is a non-drying oil, changing but slowly by exposure to the atmosphere, and remaining fluid in a cold several degrees below 32° Fahrenheit. It contains, beside oleic and palmitic acids, two other oily acids, which hav been called the arahic and hypogeic, though it is doubtful if they are really distinct. The principal consumption of the oil is in soap-making. In 1883 Virginia began the manufacture of peanut flour, the result being a peculiarly palatable biscuit, while Georgia has long made pastry of pounded peanuts.

The kernels roasted are largely used in the manufacture of chocolate, while the amande de terre, as has been shown, is used by the confectioners. It is also eaten as a fruit and roasted for coffee. The poor man's fruit, the peanut, is capable of sustaining life for a long time, owing to its peculiarly nutritiv qualities, the negroes using it alike in porridge, custard, or as a beverage. Nor does its usefulness end here, for the vines form a splendid fodder, as good as clover hay, while hogs will fatten on what they find in the fields after the crop has been gathered. It is an easy crop to raise. The demand for nuts has treb'ed within the past few years, and the supply has never yet equaled the demand. The quantity used in this country may be set down at three million bushels.

Read "All In a Lifetime."

READERS, YOUNG AND OLD: Few persons of seventy hav read more papers and books than I, as I could read fluently at four years of age, but did not go to school till thirteen and not much since. It would astonish even me to see together all the books I hav read, and all this reading has, with the great book of nature, taught me how little and also how great I am—what a small space I occupy and how short my life. I think I am a judge of the best, highest, and most truthful books, which, as far as they are truthful, are but second-hand copies of nature, which includes its highest department, human nature. A book to benefit its readers must tell the truth and describe nature, and especially human nature, as it is. Its author must be pervaded and dominated by a love of truth, liberty, justice, and humanity. Such a book and such an author are found in "All In a Lifetime." I lately borrowed it and read it with great pleasure and interest. Its various and different characters in contrast, good and bad, high and low, wise and ignorant, noble and degraded, truthful and false, Freethinkers and bigots, are most vividly portrayed and described, and all the higher and lower motivs, impulses, and attributes of humanity are depicted faithfully and truly. Especially does the author make emphatic and prominent the exalted character and divine persistence of human love. Reader, buy and read this book. It will make you wiser, richer, and better. PROF. J. H. COOK.

[We thank our kind friend for the above unexpected indorsement of "All In A Lifetime." We would be very glad to dispose of the copies still on hand, as well as our other books. While thankful for past patronage, we would respectfully invite a continuation of the same.

In another column may be found a pathetic poem from the pen of that sweet singer of the West, Mrs. Finch. May the subject of the poem never again feel neglected, forsaken, and forlorn. The workers in the field of Freethought are not so many that we can afford that even one should suffer from any of the ills of life.—ED. C. C.]

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Dr. Joker: "Your dolly appears to be out of sorts to-day, doesn't she?" Doll's mother: "Well, I guess you'd feel out of sorts, too, if you had all the sawdust spilled out of you."

Omaha teacher: "Can any of the class explain to me why the way of the transgressor is hard?" Omaha spark: "I guess it's cause it's traveled so much."

A little four-year-old cried as though his heart was ready to snap asunder, says the Cleveland Plaindealer. He wanted to visit his playmate, Eddie Small, who livs across the way, and his mother wouldn't permit it. "You mustn't go over to play with Eddie, now, my dear," said the fond mother; "I hav already told you that he has the measles, and you're sure to catch them if you go near him." The little fellow cried louder than ever, and between sobs and tears the mother heard him say: "I want to catch the measles, ma, that's why I want to go over." This rather startling desire on the part of the youngster led to curiosity, and when the mother wanted to know what had made him so ambitious, he replied: "I heard Eddie's ma say that since Eddie catched the measles she bought him lots of nice new playthings. I want a drum and a baseball and rattle, that's what I want. Please, mamma, let me catch the measles."

It Would Not Work Twice.

A Trout which had been caught by an Angler pleaded piteously for mercy. "You see I am distended with spawn," it cried, "and in a few weeks I shall deposit my eggs, and these will bring you thousands of trout. If you kill me all these will be lost." The Angler turned a merciful ear to these pleadings and placed the trout back in the water.

A few months afterward the angler again caught this Trout. It pleaded for mercy. "I hav within me," it said, "the germs of hundreds of trout, and these will all be lost if you kill me."

The Angler, as he placed the trout in his creel, replied: "Your pleading avails you nothing. The return you offer me for my investment is too far distant, and I may never catch any of your young. Besides that, if I were to listen to all your pleadings I should always go home with an empty creel."—New York Herald.

How "Uncle Sam" Got His Name.

The term came into use in the war of 1812, and originated at Troy, N. Y. The government inspector there was Samuel Wilson, universally known as Uncle Sam. Whenever he inspected supplies furnished the government he would brand them U. S., meaning United States, but, the abbreviation being then new and not generally recognized, the workmen supposed it to mean Uncle Sam, the inspector. Afterward, the story got repeated and got into print, and from that time the name has been facetiously applied to the United States.

The New Church Doctrin.

There's come a sing'lar doctrin, Sue,
  Into our church, to-day;
These cur'us words are what the new
  Young preacher had to say:
That literal everlastin' fire
  Was mostly in our eye;
That sinners dead, if they desire,
  Can get another try;
He doubted if a warmer clime
  Than this world could be proved;
The little snip—I fear some time
  He'll get his doubts removed.

I've watched my duty straight an' true,
  An' tried to do it well;
Part of the time kept heaven in view,
  An' part steered clear o' hell;
An' now half of this work is naught,
  If I must list to him,
An' this 'ere devil I hav fought
  Was only just a whim;
Vain are the dangers I hav braved,
  The sacrifice they cost;
For what fun is it to be saved
  If no one else is lost?

Just think!—Suppose when once I view
  The heaven I've toiled to win,
A lot of unsaved sinners, too,
  Comes walkin' grandly in!
An' acts to home, same as if they
  Had read their titles clear,
An' looks at me, as if to say,
"We're glad to see you here!"
As if to say, "While you hav b'en
  So fast to toe the mark,
We waited till it rained, an' then
  Got tickets for the ark!"

Yet there would be some in that crowd
  I'd rather like to see:
My poor boy Jack—it must be 'lowed
  There was no worse than he!
I've always felt somewhat to blame,
  In several different ways,
That he lay down on thorns o' shame
  To end his boyhood's days;
An' I'd be willin' to endure,
  If that the Lord thought best,
A minute's quite hot temperature
  To clasp him to my breast.

Old Captain Barnes was evil's son—
  With heterodoxy crammed;
I used to think he'd be the one
  If anyone was damned;
Still, when I saw a lot o' poor,
  That he had clothed an' fed,
Cry desolately round his door
  As soon as he was dead,
There came a thought beyond control,
  That, in some neutral land,
I'd like to meet that scorched-up soul,
  An' shake it by the hand.

Poor Jennie Willis, with a cry
  Of hopeless, sad distress,
Sank sudden down, one night, to die,
  All in her ball-room dress;
She had a precious little while
  To pack up an' away;
She even left her sweet, good smile—
  'Twas on the face next day;
Her soul went off unclothed by even
  One stitch of saving grace;
How could she hope to get to heaven,
  An' start from such a place?

But once, when I lay sick an' weak,
  She came, an' begged to stay;
She kissed my faded, wrinkled cheek—
  She soothed my pain away;
She brought me sweet bouquets of flowers
  As fresh as her young heart—
Through many long an' tedious hours
  She played a Christian part;
An' ere I long will stand aroun'
  The singin' saints among,
I'll try to take some water down
  To cool poor Jennie's tongue.

But tears can never quench my creed,
  Nor smooth God's righteous frown,
Though all the preachers learn to read
  Their Bibles upside down.
I hold mine right side up with care
  To shield my eyes from sin,
An' coax the Lord, with daily prayer,
  To call poor wanderers in;
But if the sinners won't draw nigh,
  An' take salvation's plan,
I'll hav to stand an' see 'em try
  To dodge hell if they can.

—Will Carleton.

Obituary.

It is extremely painful to hav to record the death of one of our useful members, W. H. Alexander, who departed this life August 20th, aged sixty-five years. The thought of his having to leave a devoted wife and family behind was the only regret that marred his happiness. He passed away as serenely as a child that sleeps at its mother's breast. He was conscious up to the last moment of his life. The principles of Freethought not only sustained him through life, but in the hour of death they acted as a consoler. As I was informed by his beloved wife that he made the particular request that I should speak at his funeral, many times before he died and also when he was well, that no preacher of the gospel should be allowed at his funeral, his wish was complied with. We also had the president of the League, J. W. Shaw, to speak at the funeral. He gave a very fine address on the occasion. Our brother was a Liberal in every sense of the word; no man of any creed was the keeper of his conscience. My experience with him the years that I had known him was exceedingly pleasant. Would that I could say the same of Christians that I hav had dealings with. But, alas! they hav cheated me, and then prayed to their imaginary God for forgivness. We fully sympathize with the devoted wife and family in their great loss, and hope they will emulate him in living a good and useful life, so that when their time shall come they may lie down in peaceful slumbers as did their beloved departed.

To die, and pass away we know not where;
  The world forgets us ere we scarce hav fled;
Yet shall our actions long survive us here—
  Good deeds work blessings though their author's dead.

Peace and respect be with his memory!

GEO. LONGFORD, Secretary.

Philadelphia, Aug. 23, 1889.

For the first time the Chicago Secular Union has been called upon to mourn the death of one of its members, not one hoary with age, who had "fought his fight," but one who was as the morning sun, just peering forth in promises of splendor, of noon-day glory, promising to the human family that encouragement, warmth, vigor, and hope which ever radiate from the brain of sympathetic man.

A. E. Hutchinson, during the brief morning of his life, illustrated the golden depth of truth in the passage, "The way to gain friends, is to be one." In life he was not alone; his friends clustered about him, their faces glowing with pride and love; and when he arose, calm and sublime of feature, to measure swords with experienced and brilliant debaters, the enthusiasm of his friends was ever made manifest, and he lacked not the reward of their commendation and encouragement.

So in death his saddened young friends, with many elderly ones, were united in effort and love. Grouped together beneath the mournful dark shadow of a common loss, with the draped emblems of death on either side, they stand as one, chastened by sorrow, enriched by a depth of sweet and tender feelings, "which from real affection grow."

One by one these friends step forward. Young men who, but a little while since, were heroically taking part in fiery debate, now advance with faltering step, tear-dimmed eye, and tremulous tone, to pay the last fond tribute to their departed friend. I assure you, dear reader, it was a scene long to be remembered, a scene that would soften the flintiest heart. In front of the speakers was a large oil painting of the deceased, and by its side stood a "vacant chair," with a floral pillow bearing the word "Peace," all draped in mourning by loving fingers. The following is a brief synopsis of the services: Song, "Vacant Chair," Miss Flora Moore. Address by Prof. James Milleson, president of the Chicago Secular Union, who first opened the services by stating the sad nature of the meeting, and that it was improvised to take the place of Mr. Hutchinson's lecture, "Great Reformers, Past and Present," which was to hav been delivered this very evening. Remarks were then made by Professor Milleson, Mrs. Mattie Freeman, A. T. Wineman, George Borst, Mr. Seymour Steadman, and Alfred Schaffner. Mr. Henry Borst read a poem.

AUGUSTA A. HOLMES,
Secretary Chicago Secular Union.

Aug. 12, 1889.

Mr. E. L. Sanford died suddenly of congestion of the brain, July 17th. He was born in Rootstown, Portage county, O., 1832. He enlisted as a soldier during the war in the 82d O. V. I., and belonged to the A. H. Day post, G. A. R. The A. H. Day post conducted the services at the funeral with military honors—the last tribute of respect over a fallen comrade. Mr. Sanford has been an earnest Secularist for several years, and has been a willing worker in the cause of mental emancipation from sectarian serfdom. Having thrown off the chains of slavery to priestcraft and accepted the scepter of self-control, ever willing to labor for the success of the Nine Demands, generously supporting the lecturers in the field as they came to Kent, always present with his influence directed in favor of Secular ideas, he had the courage to stand by his convictions and the manhood to defend his sentiments whenever they were assailed by time-serving sycophants. And he clearly saw the baneful influence of the soul-dwindling creeds as well as the sanctified mockery of priestly dogmatism of the Christian religion. Mr. F. G. Reed, for whom he worked for several years, says, "I never had a more honest man in my employ." His bereaved wife gave me a manuscript which he wrote a short time before his death. The language is mostly that of Dr. Felix Oswald. I send it to you. You can publish any part or all of it if you please. Peace to his ashes.

Kent, O., Aug. 10th. JOSEPH HEIGHTON.

MR. SANFORD'S MANUSCRIPT.

Christianity has retarded the progress of the human race by at least fifteen hundred years. The fruits of science and social reform, which our descendants will reap in fifteen centuries hence, might be enjoyed at the present moment, if the last sixty generations had not wasted their time in disputes about the interpretation of idiotic dogmas, and the attempt to gain the heaven of a future world by despising the blessings of the present.

On the altar of her antinatural idol the Christian church has sacrificed the lives of eighteen millions of the noblest and bravest of our fellow-men.

Two millions were butchered in the wars against the freedom-loving children of nature, the Saxons, the Sarmatians, and the pagan Scandinavians; one million in the wars against the Arian heretics; at least five millions in the seven larger and four smaller Crusades.

The extermination of the Spanish Saracens reduced the population of the peninsula by seven millions. One million was slaughtered in the fifteen years' man-hunt against the Albigenses, the thirty years' war against the Protestant princes, the massacres of the French Huguenots, the Waldenses, and the insurgents of the Netherlands. A full million human lives were devoured by the Moloch of the Holy Inquisition and the witch tribunals, which for nearly seven centuries infested all the principal cities of Christian Europe. To this number we might add the twelve million aborigines of the New World, who in less than a century fell victims to the insane fury of their Christian conquerors and the unremitting persecutions of the Christian Inquisition. Many of the Inquisitors were men of spotless morality, and pitied the fate of their victims, but their horrible creed left them no choice.

The blood of thirty millions of our fellow-men cries out against the nature-hating fanatic who inculcated the belief in the sinfulness of our natural instincts, the guilt of skepticism, and the possibility of satanic incarnations.

Christianity has turned whole nations of freedom-loving men into slaves. The worst tyranny that has ever oppressed the children of this earth was perpetrated in the name of the Christian God, and when the sources of earthly misery were exhausted, the church elaborated that dogma of a hell of eternal and all but inevitable tortures which destroyed the last solace of the wretched as well as the peace of daily life. Every appeal to common sense and mercy was punished as a crime against the authority of an infallible church; every atrocity was sanctioned that would help to crush the instinct of free inquiry, the dignity of manhood, the sense of justice, the love of joy, freedom, and nature; all amusements and all the joyous instincts of the human heart, all the natural affections, all social pleasures, were alike sinful.

The clergy looked on all comforts as sinful in themselvs merely because they were comforts. The great object of life was to be in a state of constant affliction. Whatever pleased the senses was to be suspected. It mattered not what a man liked; the mere fact of his liking it made it sinful. Whatever was natural was wrong. A man of sorrows became a type of moral perfection. The cross, an instrument of torture, became the trade-mark of the new religion. Beauty and harmony was the oldest Grecian term for God's wonderful world; a vale of tears the favorit Christian epithet.

Daily drudgery and daily self-denial are still considered the proper sphere of a law-abiding citizen, and special affliction a special sign of divine favor. We do not think it necessary to alleviate the distress of the poor till it reaches a degree that threatens to end it. We enforce every child's right to liv and become a humble tithe-paying Christian, but as for its claim to liv happy we refer it to the sweet by-and-bye. But the dawn of the day of our deliverance has already arrived, and no one deserves his liberty who does not contribute his share to the emancipation of his fellow-men. The bigotry of a besotted fanatic is hardly more contemptible than the cautious selfishness of the man who silently enjoys the sweet air of freedom, while thousands of his brethren sicken in the dungeon of antinaturalism.

The Agnostic and apathetic creed of science must become a positiv religion. The energy which we owe to the fear of disease should be inspired by the love of health. Before the end of this century the protest against the enemies of nature should consummate its triumph in a gospel of earthly happiness. The religion of the future will dispense with stakes and torture chambers. It will employ no weapon but logic; no inquisition but the inquiry after truth. It will appeal to no higher canon than the progressiv revelation of science.

All the thinkers, discoverers, and reformers who were the enemies of religion will become its missionaries. The path of its victory will not lead over the trampled flowers of this earth. The religion of nature will dispense with miracles. It will heal the sick by teaching them to avoid the causes of disease. It will help the poor by increasing their means of self-help; it will still their hunger after happiness with better fare than litanies and consecrated wafers. We may keep our altars; but the priests of the future will not require the sacrifice of our reason, of our freedom, and our natural affections, and will not reject an honest votary though he should decline to hate his father and mother—yea, and his own life. We shall worship our god in the temple of nature, and if paradise can be regained we shall try to enjoy it on this side of the grave.

Dr. Foote Revisits Salt Lake City.

From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Dr. Foote, Sr., would announce that he contemplates making a brief visit to Salt Lake City in October. In the spring of 1885, it will be remembered by the readers of the Health Monthly, we visited Salt Lake City for the purpose of exposing and dislodging a pretender who was using the name of Dr. Foote, Jr., and representing himself as the son of Dr. E. B. Foote, of New York. He had established a large practice on the strength of these misrepresentations, and it took several weeks to collect such evidence as would lead Judge Zane to grant an injunction restraining this impostor from continuing to impose upon the community in the way mentioned. But the injunction came at last, and the "Fraud Jr.," as we called him, precipitately fled early one Sunday morning before honest people were out of their beds. While in Salt Lake City we met hundreds of our correspondents and patients of former times, and formed many new friendships, which led us to promis that we would some day repeat the visit that proved so agreeable to us and so beneficial to many. This time the trip will be made more with a view to recuperation and change than to business considerations, but if those who would like to meet us there would address us to that effect, we will keep all such correspondents posted in regard to our movements and appoint time and place when and where we will see all friends, correspondents, and patients who may desire an interview whether of friendly or professional character. Professional interviews, as usual, will be free, no fees being charged except for medicins. Therefore, friends and readers of publications in the West, write at once, those of you who would like to meet Dr. E. B. Foote, Sr., addressing your letters to 120 Lexington avenue, New York, and if no unforeseen circumstance occurs to prevent the contemplated visit you will be duly notified. All, indeed, in Utah and the adjoining states and territories, who hav physical ailments which home skill has failed to relieve, are invited to place themselvs in correspondence with us, and when we can appoint time and place for interview we will notify by personal letter. We rarely leave home for recreation and scarcely ever on professional business, the last time being in 1885, as already mentioned. Patients are visiting us from time to time at our office here in New York from Utah, Idaho, Nevada, Arizona, Wyoming, Colorado, Dakota, Montana, and other Western states and territories, and doubtless there are hundreds more who would be pleased to hav the opportunity for a personal consultation if it could be had without a long and expensiv journey to New York. To all such we send as greeting this brief announcement. Send in your names and addresses right away, or as early as possible, and you shall hav due notice when the senior editor of this paper arrives in Salt Lake City. Appointments for interviews can be arranged by letter as already stated.

During the brief absence of the senior the junior will be in charge of affairs at home. The genuin Dr. E. B. Foote, Jr., author of "Health in the Sunbeam," "Radical Remedy in Social Science," "Bacteria in their Relation to Disease," "Gynecology," etc., who has been constantly engaged in professional work with the senior since 1875-6, at which time he was graduated from the College of Physicians and Surgeons in New York, is well known to the readers of the Murray Hill publications and our patients hereabouts. He will be assisted by Dr. L. Cohn, who for fifteen years has had charge of the German department in Dr. Foote's office, and by Dr. Hubert T. Foote, brother of the junior, who is at the head of the sanitary bureau. In such hands no one is likely to suffer in the temporary absence of Dr. Foote, Sr.

SISERA FLEETH.

Sisera lighted down off his chariot and fled away on his feet.—Judges iv, 15.

Odds and Ends.

COURTROOM sign: "Do not shoot the judiciary; they are doing the best they can."

WHENEVER trouble arises in the church choir everybody simply takes his chants.—Washington Capital.

VISITING minister: "What kind of people are those MacWaggons?" Slimly: "Oh, they hav the largest Bible in the whole town."

PROFESSOR: "What great art must every clergyman master before he can succeed?" Smart student: "The art of concealing his ignorance."

ST. PETER: "I do not recognize you. What is that bundle under your arm?" Mortal: "Only the earth. I——" St. Peter: "Walk right in, Mr. Gould!"

COLONEL SHEPARD (enthusiastically): "Can't an editor be a Christian?" Mail and Express readers (wearily): "Yes; but every Christian can't be an editor."—Puck.

REFINED cruelty: By the ancient laws of Hungary, a man convicted of bigamy was condemned to liv with both wives in the same house. The crime was, in consequence, extremely rare.

CUSTOMER: "How much time do you giv me?" Tailor: "None, sir. I never giv any credit." "How's that?" "Until recently I was editor of a religious weekly."—Clothier and Furnisher.

SAYS a correspondent: "Our little boy said, while reciting to his mother, 'The Lord is my shepherd; I shall not want. But I've got him; and I do want a pony, and lots of things besides.'"

A SINGER who sang in the choir
Asked the leader a rival to foir,
And when he refused
She so roundly abused
Him he forced her herself to retoir.
—Boston Courier.

TWISTED HISTORY.—Sunday-school teacher: "Now, Johnny Hapgood, it's your turn. What did his father do when the prodigal son returned?" Johnny (who can't help reading the sporting editions of the daily press): "Please, sir, he jumped on his neck and kissed him."—Puck.

FATHER: "Tommy, I hear you hav been fishing on the Lord's day. I shall see that you are severely punished." Tommy: "Well, pa, you always said, 'Spare the rod and spoil the child,' so I used the rod all day long down to the river. Seems so I can't please you, nohow."—Kearney Enterprise.

TOMMY: "My father is a church-member." Johnny: "So's mine." Tommy: "But my father says your papa ain't, 'coz he don't never come to church nor put nothin' in the collection box." Johnny (bravely): "Well, my papa is an honorary member, and honorary members don't chip in."

"I DON'T believe you hav been to the Sunday-school. You've been in swimming. Your hair is wet and your trousers are hindpart foremost." "Well, you see, mar, I was runnin' so hard ter Sunday-school that my head got all wet wid perspiration and then I fell down, and I was going so fast I turned over in my trousers."

ONCE a lady who had been disappointed in love wrote with a diamond ring upon a window pane the following line: "God made man upright, and he——" Here the sentence stopped. A gentleman, chancing to see it afterward, added to it the following:—"might hav remained so, but he created woman, and she ——"—Texas Siftings.

A LITTLE fellow whose fifth birthday is at hand heard the question of a newcomer, "How old is that infant?" His reply was: "She ain't old at all; she has just begun." After he had seen the infant he said to his mother: "Mamma, that baby had her hair cut in heaven. I suppose they thought she would not be strong enough to walk to the barber's."

A LITTLE tot, before tumbling into her nest the other night, offered her slumber prayer as follows:

Now I lay me down to sleep,
I pray the Lord my soul to keep.
If I should die before I wake
(I wouldn't die for a hundred dollars)
I pray the Lord my soul to take.
—New Bedford Standard.

"How the world was made" is being discussed in a scientific magazine. We know. They got all the cash subscriptions along the line they could, then bonded so much as they could build with that money for all the rest of us, watered the stock like a deluge and rushed it through before anybody could get out an injunction. Then the English came along and got hold of it, as usual.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Oval pieces of finely polished crystal improve the vision.

SOME UNANSWERED QUESTIONS.

Whether there are more great or small people in the world.

At what precise point in life a man ceases to be middle-aged.

When you make your first, your greatest, and your last mistake in life.

How Shakspere could hav been so well informed without taking a newspaper.

Who is the most important and who the least important person in your neighborhood.

How so many people can be satisfied with themselvs when they are entirely different from us.

Whether a hundred years hence George Washington or some baseball hero will appear the more glorious character.

Why there are not even more of the famous theological critics, seeing it is so easy to become a famous theological critic.

Gems of Thought.

IN science, when facts and theory do not agree, the theory is at once and without hesitation rejected. In theology this is impossible. The fundamental theory, that God is man-like, is contained in a miraculous revelation. Touch that with the hand of criticism, and theology ceases to exist. Hence the origin of the theological dogma; that of all virtues faith is the greatest, and that of all sins doubt is the most fatal. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; and he that believeth not shall be damned." In theology this resource for getting rid of a difficulty by labeling it a "mystery," and so putting it on one side, is a very necessary one.—John Wilson, M.D., in Science, Theology and Ethics.

WHEN men, whether from policy or pious fraud, set up systems of religion incompatible with the word or works of God in the creation, and not only above, but repugnant to human comprehension, they were under the necessity of inventing or adopting a word that should serve as a bar to to all questions, inquiries, and speculations. The word mystery answered this purpose.—Paine.

IT is not in our power to judge as we will. The judgment is carried along necessarily by the evidence, real or seeming, which appears to us at the time.—Reid.

THE brain thinks without asking our consent; we believe, or disbelieve, without an effort of the will. B-lief is a result. It is the effect of evidence upon the mind. The scales turn in spite of him who watches. There is no opportunity of being honest or dishonest in the formation of an opinion. The conclusion is entirely independent of desire. We must believe, or we must doubt, in spite of what we wish.—Ingersoll.

FOR sixteen centuries Christianity had opportunity to show its power in Europe, but it was only when the printing press got to work and scholars circulated a knowledge of the laws of nature that society made any marked or rapid advance.—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

A GREATER number of those atrocious actions which fill the mind of man with astonishment and horror, occurred in the history of the Middle Ages, than in that of any period of the same extent in the annals of Europe.—Robertson's Survey of the State of Europe.

THE primitiv tendency or instinct of mankind is to assimilate all the agencies which they perceive in nature, to the only one of which they are directly conscious, their own voluntary activity. Every object which seems to originate power, that is, to act without first being visibly acted upon, to communicate motion without having received it, they suppose to possess life, consciousness, will.—John Stuart Mill.

MAN, in his ignorance, supposed that all phenomena were produced by some intelligent powers, and with direct reference to him. To preserve friendly relations with these powers was, and still is, the object of all religions.—Ingersoll.

THE press is the best instrument for enlightening the mind of man, and improving him as a rational, moral, and social being.—Thomas Jefferson.

SHED light, not blood.—Ingersoll.

A MAN can consume sugar (carbon), take in water, and breathe air, and the resultant force, when acting through his physical form, may turn the crank of an electric dynamo which converts his work into electricity, which may appear as heat in one place, as power in another, as light in another, and as sound in another. Parallel: A steam engin and boiler may consume sugar or coal (both carbon), take in water and air, and the resultant force, acting through the form called an engin, can turn the dynamo, and produce the same identical results. And if either form or machine be sufficiently impaired, or the supply of either the air, water, or carbon be shut off, they both alike come to a stop.—Prof. C. L. Haskell.

I HOLD that the human body, like all living bodies, is a machine, all the operations of which will sooner or later be explained on physical principles. I believe we shall sooner or later arrive at a mechanical equivalent of consciousness, just as we hav arrived at a mechanical equivalent of heat.—Huxley.

IF slavery was a crime in Egypt, was it a virtue in Palestine? Did God treat the Canaanites better than Pharaoh did the Jews? Was it right for Jehovah to kill the children of the people because of Pharaoh's sin? Should the peasant be punished for the king's crime? Do you not know that the worst thing that can be said of Nero, Caligula, and Commodus is that they resembled the Jehovah of the Jews? After all, was not Bacchus as good as Jehovah? Is it not better to drink wine than to shed blood? Was there anything in the worship of Venus worse than giving captured maidens to satisfy the victor's lust? Did "Mammon" or Moloch do anything more infamous than to establish slavery?—Ingersoll.

THE INJUSTICE OF THE CHRISTIAN SCHEME OF SALVATION.

Notes and Clippings.

As Eve remarked to Adam: "The fall has come."

OUR pulpits under the new order of things are fast becoming arenas for the display of scientific skepticism and Agnostic argumentation instead of religious instruction and comfort.—Hebrew Standard.

THE Rev. Dr. Henry Van Dyke asks in the Presbyterian, "Why should we retain in our creed what none of us believe, what all our teachers of theology reject, and what serves only to bring reproach upon our doctrins among them that are without?"

A. H. PETERS'S paper in the Forum on "The Extinction of Leisure," is a ost suggestiv one. By leisure he means not "sluggardliness or inaction, but choice of action. . . . With no leisure there can be no intelligence, and without intelligence democracy cannot exist." The paper is a plea for such a wholesome mean of activity and leisure as shall conduce to a life most full and free.

A LONDON dispatch reads: Cardinal Lavigesa, it is understood, will shortly appeal, in the name of the holy father, Leo XIII., to the nations of Europe to purchase from the Infidel defilers the holy city of Jerusalem, and as much of its surroundings as will be necessary to form a small province, to be forever independent and to guarantee its integrity. If successful, this victory for the cause of civilization, it is considered by the cardinal and Pope Leo, would be the greatest triumph ever achieved by the Catholic church, and would endear it to the affections of many now alienated from its teachings and prestige, and would do much toward creating a general desire for the restoration of its temporal power.

THE Peace convention just closed at Mystic, Conn., resolved: "That we build a peace temple to be used for lectures, conventions, schools, etc., wherein shall be taught the principles of arbitration as a substitute for war and a settlement of all difficulties;" and: "That an application be made to the state legislature of Connecticut for $10,000 to aid in this building, and that our members and friends be solicited to contribute for this purpose."

REV. BYRON F. SUNDERLAND, D.D., of Washington, D. C., a Presbyterian, and a member of the American Sabbath Union, in a sermon preached in Washington city, and printed in the Christian Statesman of June 27, 1889, said: "Nations and kingdoms are to be the servitors of the church, with its Bible, its sanctuary, and its Sabbaths. Human governments and races and generations are to be the enginery and the apparatus, the forces and influences through which the church shall ascend to dominion over the world, and those nations and kingdoms that refuse this grand service to the church of God shall perish and be utterly wasted."

GOVERNOR MELLETTE has issued the following proclamation: "I, Arthur C. Mellette, governor of the territory of Dakota, by virtue of the authority vested in me by section 12 of the schedule of the constitution adopted by the constitutional convention of North Dakota at Bismarck, Aug. 17, 1889, do hereby call an election by the people of the proposed state of North Dakota on the first Tuesday in October, 1889, for the purpose of electing the state, legislativ, judicial, and county officers, as provided for in said constitution, and for the purpose of voting upon the adoption or rejection of article 20 of the constitution, entitled 'Prohibition,' which is submitted as a separate proposition; and also to vote upon the adoption or rejection of the constitution."

ATTENTIV observers of religious life in Germany discern a singular phenomenon which is assuming more and more alarming proportions. On the one hand, statistics show that the ecclesiastical habits are far from being lost, so far as concerns participation in traditional acts and ceremonies. On the other hand, almost everywhere there are complaints of notable diminution in church attendance. Many churches in the towns and in the countries are three-quarters empty. At Berlin, where there are only forty-seven churches and twenty-seven chapels, with fifty thousand seats for a Protestant population of nearly one million, the church service is very little attended. People go to the cathedral to hear the fine music and see the emperor. When the liturgical service is over there is a considerable exodus—more than half the congregation goes away.—Harper's Magazine.

A CALCULATION of the prospectiv population of this country one hundred years from now is very interesting. Our population in 1750 was 1,260,000. At the end of thirty years, in 1780, it had reached 2,945,000. At the end of thirty years more, the lifetime of a generation, 1810, it stood at 7,239,881. In the course of another generation, or in 1840, it was 17,069,453. At the present time the figures run up to the neighborhood of 65,000,000. If this ratio of increase is a fair basis for prediction we shall hav at the time when the ten-year-old boy of to-day shall be forty years of age, in 1920, something like 160,000,000 of people in the United States, and when that man of forty reaches his seventieth birthday, 1950, we shall hav close upon 400,000,000. That man's son, who will be in "the youth of his old age" in 1990, one hundred years from now, will be the citizen of a republic with a population of more than 1,000,000,000.

THE First Presbyterian Church of Erie, Pa., recently called a Canadian minister to be its pastor. They were notified that if their new pastor came, it would be in violation of the contract-labor laws. The Catholic University at Washington has recently made arrangements for the importation of a faculty from Europe, and the managers feared that their professors would be prohibited by these laws. But great is the power of Catholicism with the government, and the authorities ruled that a liberal construction of the laws would be made and the Catholic professors admitted. We hav no particular affection for this law, but we hold that no discrimination should be made between Catholics and Presbyterians. The so-called American Catholic University is thoroughly foreign in its character, and might just as well be located in Rome. It will not be American in any sense. And why its foreign professors should be hired and brought over here, while a Presbyterian church cannot hav the same privilege, is one of the questions this government must answer.—Hartford Christian Secretary.

Communications.

On the War Path.

At Johnstown there was a whole family floating on a raft, singing "Nearer, My God, to Thee." While they were singing the raft struck a big tree. They threw up their hands, there was a wild shriek, and their connection with the scenes in life was severed forever.

Oh, what a lesson! Oh, what a merciful God! Oh, what a deluded people! Always trusting in God, only to find that he never comes to their relief in the hour of danger. Instead of showing his loving kindness, his acts are often treacherous. Instead of showing mercy, his acts are many times most brutal.

The guilty club that owned the lake and heeded not the frequsnt warning in regard to the insecurity of the dam was spared. The most deserving and heroic of all, who rode before the rolling wall of water warning the people to flee for their lives, was overtaken and swallowed up by the flood.

God has always been addicted to such freaks. He saves a sneak and kills a hero. He prospers the vile, and suffers the most humane and deserving to liv in poverty and rags.

These considerations ought to teach us that we liv in a world of law; that the God which Christians prate so much about is as powerless as a corpse, and as unable to bless or to curse as a shadow is.

In Johnstown they are holding outdoor meetings, and priest and minister are trying to make the people believe that God is merciful and their only friend, and that they ought to be thankful to him. It would seem impossible for intelligent men to teach such bald-headed absurdity. To tell a poor woman who has been stripped of everything she holds dear —husband, children, and friends—that she ought to feel thankful to God is to outrage every human feeling and spit in the face of common sense.

Is it any wonder that such bigots should persecute with fire and sword those who differ from them? Woe, woe, to the day when the government shall be trusted to their keeping! How can it be expected that such men can recognize the rights of those who differ from them?

And here and there, as up the crags you spring,
Mark many rude-carved crosses near the patn;
Yet deem them not devotion's offering—
These are memorials frail of murderous wrath;
For wheresoe'er the shrieking victim hath
Poured forth his blood beneath the assassin's knife,
Some hand erects a cross of moldering lath;
And grove and glen with thousand such are rife
Throughout this purple land, where law secures not life.

This picture of lawlessness was true of every Christian country during the Dark Ages, and is true of some now; and there are many who do not see that the "Blare" bill is the first step toward making it true of this.

You, Mr. "Blare," are to be privileged to build as many churches as you can pay for. Nobody must stint you in regard to the hight of the steeples; make them pierce the skies if you desire. You are to be privileged to keep the Sabbath as holy as you please. But you must not use my money to support your churches without my consent. Nor must you compel me to observe the Sabbath after your fashion. In order to enjoy your rights you must not curtail mine. Isn't this fair, Mr. "Blare?" When you are allowed to hav everything your own way, why compel me to do as you say? After these terrible calamities, if you still believe God is good, you hav a right to say so. If I think you are a great fool, I hav an equal right to say that. I am in favor of religion, but it is the religion of humanity, the religion of justice, of honesty, a mind-your-own-business religion. But Christians hav never been satisfied with the religion of equal rights. Think as I think, do as I say, or you will offend God, and hell will be the consequence. To one who has reasoned far enough to see that no system of religion should giv one man privileges which are withheld from another, it seems strange that superstition should so blind men that they will try to compel others to keep step to their music. But there are but few who really consider how the human mind can be warped by hundreds of years of training.

I am informed that a remnant of the cliff dwellers has been discovered. They are described as a cautious, timid, bashful, retiring people. Suppose that many centuries ago these people were overpowered, pursued, and persecuted by superior numbers and tactics. To evade their enemies they built their homes far up in the cliffs. This fear, this timidity, after the lapse of many generations, has become indelibly stamped upon the character. Under the best system of training this peculiar feature of timidity will characterize this people for many generations. And it shows how much we are the creatures of the circumstances of the long-ago.

In view of this fact, it is no wonder that the lessons of nature are lost on a Christian. We are to-day battling with the effect of lessons taught by and to the ignorant of three thousand years ago.

These calamities of flood and fire ought to enable us to see how pernicious it is to teach, to the young especially, that God will protect them in the hour of danger. They should be taught that they must depend upon their own foresight and precaution. Self-reliance is the proper lesson; the gods never can be depended upon.

It is interesting to read the sermons on the Johnstown disaster. One minister sees the hand of God in it, and tells you just where you may see it. Another one says: "Yes, the hand of God was in it," but not where the other one saw it. Still another says God had nothing to do with it. Poor God, how ridiculous your friends make you appear!

A minister in Rochester preached a sermon on the Johnstown disaster. After dodging from right to left, and wallowing in the mire of superstition, and running against the various rocks of absurdity, he came to the conclusion that after all, view it as we might, God is good. That very afternoon lightning tore some of the buildings to splinters, and a terrific hail-storm threshed that city as with a great flail.

How long will the people gulp down such nauseating spawn? One thing is certain, there will be clerical lickspittles to serve it out as long as the people will stand it.

But there is a rift in the cloud. There is a light breaking, though it may be but dim, which may be regarded as the harbinger of a better day.

A short time ago the ministers of Rochester were very much exercised about the desecration of the Sabbath. They proposed to hav something done, and that immediately. There were complaints of Sunday papers, ball games, Sunday excursions, and a general line of immoral bric-a-brac obnoxious to the puritanical eyes. Looking through the clerical mist, I said, The churches are not as well attended on Sunday as these hypocritical pretenders desire. "Only this and nothing more."

Not long ago I was in the city over Sunday. I went to the depot and boarded a train. There was a snort and a puff and a clang, and we were bounding along the rail toward Irondequoit bay.

It was a spacious, open car, and one would think from the confusion of tongues that nearly every nationality was represented. There were groups representing whole families—fathers, mothers, son, daughters, down to babe in arms. Merchants, clerks, mechanics, day-laborers, cooks, nurses—all feeling buoyant, all seeming to be pleased with the idea that there was one day in the week when they could get away from the store, the office, the workshop, and the constant grind, dust, choke, and swelter of the crowded city.

I sat silent, watching the motley crowd, while my mind was busy. I had heard the preacher's complaint—my mission was to investigate the matter.

Though these people hav been confined all the week, some of them taking their breakfast at six o'clock and their dinner in a pail, and not returning until seven in the evening, yet these boggish ministers would compel these tired, worn-out people to remain in the city all day Sunday to hear their silly talk about lambs and saviors, apples and snakes, providence and prophets, which hav disgusted common-sense people long enough.

When I arrived at the bay I felt as though, after wandering through the wilderness of superstition all my life, at last in my old age I had got a glimpse of the promised land.

There was boating and fishing, games and target-shooting, merry-go-rounds and sports of all kinds. Each after his own fashion seemed bound to make the most out of the day.

As I gazed upon the happy throng, involuntarily I clapped my hands, for my soul seemed bursting with gladness. It seemed as though for the first time in my life I had seen the full blaze of the sun of freedom.

O ye gospel-bummers! O ye canting, hypocritical sneaks! O ye lying, slimy, crawling worms! O ye outragers of humanity! O ye rapers of the innocent! Would ye drive these happy souls away from their innocent sports to your solemn, gloomy dens to hear your nauseating drivel?

Better a thousand times with honest hands to earn the bread you eat, and then with those whose hearts are made glad with the inspiring breath of nature rejoice in the freedom which is the birthright of all.

In the afternoon, being bent on business, I went down to Charlotte, where the same thing was repeated, only on a grander scale. There were dime museums, paintings, bowling alleys, billiards, and other attractions too numerous to mention. Here the people assemble every Sunday and find a day of rest, each according to his taste.

They were all well dressed and well behaved. During the whole day I saw nothing out of character except the saloons, and they are no worse on Sunday than any other day to anybody but a Christian. He lays more stress on the time when an act is committed than upon the nature of the act itself.

A long train was filled when we returned to the city. Then I realized as never before the real cause of the cry which had gone up from the clerical lickspittles in regard to the desecration of the Sabbath. These Sunday excursions and recreations deplete their churches, and there is a little money spent which does not reach the pockets of these pulp-headed dugongs.

It is not the morals of the people about which they are so much concerned, but the loss of prestige and power and profit which gravels their kidneys.

All this cry about the morals of the people is mere cant and bosh. When they make such pretensions, to tell plain truth they lie. The more they are studied, and the more carefully their motivs are scrutinized by the close observer, the more hollow and hypocritical their pretensions will appear. The closer I watch them the more I am persuaded that as a class, according to their profession, they are the most dishonest, meddlesome, and tyrannical people that ever trod the earth.

Years ago it was a practice with the churches to hav a protracted or camp meeting, or some kind of blow-out, every year.

The thinking class of people hav investigated the philosophy of those spiritual outbursts, and hav learned that those whose minds are so easily wrought upon at these pow-wows yield to any other excitement in like manner.

We hav a man here who is always on his knees during one of those spiritual jamborees. The next week if he should chance to be in a crowd where there is plenty of whisky, he would be as drunk as a fiddler. Most of the time he is filled with rum or religion.

They used to hav a great upheaval every winter, and the most of the youngsters would get their "spiritual strength renewed," which rarely outlived the next Fourth of July dance. The first on the anxious seat were the first to yield to the next excitement.

Then a minister's call to preach was from God. Now a minister's call to preach is just like a doctor's call to peddle pills, or an Irishman's to dig ditches.

Times are leveling up. A black coat and white choker are not venerated as in times past. The devil has lost his grip and hell has lost its scare, and without these a minister is worse off than a grasshopper minus one kicker.

Ten women attend church to one man. To obviate this difficulty they must get women preachers, and that will raise hob with all the sisters. Troubles multiply, and so the "Blare" bill must be put through, and the Bible put into the schools. All science and no buncombe will ultimately giv the church the blind staggers, and they know it.

The Sunday newspaper must be suppressed—the places of amusement must be closed. When they hav accomplished this much, another turn from the Christian bullies' thumb-screw will compel us all to attend church.

Talmage says "the women are the main pillars in the church." Well, I am glad that I am not a woman, because I would not like such left-handed Christian compliments. As long as women are proud of these tokens of regard from the Great American Whangdoodle, I hope they won't vote.

I am afraid of very good people. Bloody old Joshua, David, and Lot and his daughters were just a little too good. Women who are not good enough to belong to the church or to the Woman's Temperance Union, and men who are not good enough to support the "Blare" bill or to belong to the Young Men's Christian Association, are plenty good enough for me. Men just good enough to mind their own business may not be "pillars in the church," but they will be found true when the pillars of liberty are shaken.

I was putting paris green on my potatoes one Sunday, and a first corporal in one of God's churches shouted out: "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." "Does God know everything?" I asked. "I suppose he does," was the reply. "Well, then, he knows," said I, "that if he allows his potato bugs to skirmish around on my potato vines on Sunday, I will send 'em to 'kingdom come.' If he doesn't want me to do it, let him call off his bugs."

On another Sunday I had been reading until I was tired, and was hoeing in the garden to rest up. A pious pachyderm cried out, "This is a day of rest." "I hav rested, according to your idea of rest, too long already." "Oh, you don't know what is for your own good; go back and rest some more."

Thus it will be seen that our slipshod Christian with his Bible can direct a whole neighborhood. No matter how ignorant he may be, with the most unblushing assurance he will tell the most profound thinker how he ought to conduct himself.

I hav heard Christians, who never had an original thought cross their minds, rail against Voltaire in the most disgraceful manner. As a profound thinker, his equal is not produced once in a century.

Whenever there is a protracted effort, these Christian cranks get the old wax warmed over in their ears, and then they get another assurance from God that they hav been set apart in a special manner to attend to the business of other people. They know just what you ought to read, and how you ought to spend your time, and what your children ought to study in school. Their knowledge is of God, yours of earth. As heaven is above earth and God above man, their knowledge is above yours.

Freedom in a Christian country is freedom to do as Christians say.

"Good Queen Bess" said that she did not sanction the slave trade because the Africans were black, but because they were heathen. On general principles heathens and Infidels hav no rights which Christians are bound to respect.

Let the "Blare" bill pass, and it will be found that compulsion will take the place of persuasion. Comstock will next get the word "vulgar" incorporated into his law, and all too late we shall find how much India rubber there is in the English language, and how the words "vulgar" and "obscene" can be made to stretch so as to reach every man who says aught against the church or its inquisitorial methods.

We hav a class of Liberals who are all the time talking about evolution, reconstruction, building up, and all that. Why, bless their unsophisticated souls, they ought to know that it will take us a quarter of a century with our best efforts to get from under. A slave might as well talk of building railroads; his first business is to be free.

Two hundred years ago, all were born in the church and staid there. To doubt or rebel was to merit hell; and every Christian hand was raised to hurry the rebellious off to that sultry country where they would receive their "reward of merit."

It was impossible for one of the true faith to be wrong; one not of the true faith could scarcely be right, and might be tortured or plundered by Christians, and yet every Christian could read his title clear to mansions in the skies.

The father of Pizarro kept a mistress in his own house by whom he had three children. These, too, were raised in the family and made to do the most menial service. Yet hell would hav stared him in the face if he had once doubted that every word of the Bible was the word of God.

Pizarro was a hogherd and never able to read a word or write a sentence. He betrayed and murdered a great number, and murdered his old friend Almagro. His plunder made him the richest man that ever lived, before or since. He was the most cruel and desperate tyrant who ever cursed the earth—the enslaver of men and the killer of babes. And yet he was one of the most devout Christians that ever bent the knee in prayer. This shows how Christianity can mould character.

A priest always attended him crucifix in hand, and the last thing he ever did was to kiss an image of Christ. He was not the only Christian brute who has disgraced his kind. Cortez, Albuquerque, and hundreds of others, believed it to be no sin to rob and despoil those of a different faith.

Vasco Da Gamma took possession of India, with its populous cities and millions of inhabitants, in the name of God and the king. It was virtually stealing a vast empire. Albuquerque was another great Christian robber. He plundered the cities, he robbed the graves, and loaded his ships with the gold and silver and gems of India. But it must be known that, at that day, a Christian could not commit a crime against a heathen or a heretic. All of these men died, not good men, but conscientious Christians. It would hav been impossible to beat into the heads of these men that they were notorious robbers. Because they could not conceive how it could be possible for a Christian to steal from a heathen or to do any wrong to a heretic.

Eminent Women.

HARRIET MARTINEAU.

Harriet Martineau has earned a place in the hearts and memories of the people that few other men or women hav ever won.

She was feeble, delicate, and sickly all her life, and yet she left behind her a record of more "good work well done" than almost any other individual we know of.

She was born in 1802, and was one of the youngest of the eight children of a Norwich, Eng., silk manufacturer. Her parents were not wealthy, but they were well-to-do, and gave their children a good education, including many of the accomplishments as well as the more solid branches.

Harriet was a puny, ailing child, and one of intense if not morbid feelings. She had a very unhappy childhood, for being of a shy, sensitiv nature, she was pronounced cold and unsympathetic, while every fiber of her being was longing for love and tenderness. She never had the sense of smell, and consequently not much sense of taste, and before she was twenty she had lost the greater part of her hearing. Speaking of these afflictions, she says: "When my companions giv me notice of distant objects by means of any of these senses—when they tell me what is going on in an invisible field or garden, or where there is music, or what people are saying on the further side of a reach of lake on a calm summer evening—I feel a sort of start, as if I were in company with sorcerers."

Her self-consciousness and conscientiousness made her very miserable, for she was always feeling guilty of some lack of performance of duty or failure to liv up to her private maxims of life's requirements.

When less than three years old she was sent to a cottage for her health. The people there were Methodists or Calvinists, and she says: "I came home the absurdest little preacher of my years that ever was. I used to nod my head emphatically and say, 'Never ky for trifles;' 'Dooty fust and pleasure afterward,' etc., and I sometimes got courage to edge up to strangers and ask them to giv me a 'maxim.' Almost before I could join letters, I got some sheets of paper and folded them into a little square book, and wrote in double lines, two or three in a page, my beloved maxims. I believe this was my first effort at book-making."

Absurd and precocious as this seems in a child so young in years, no doubt it laid the foundation for an honorable, useful, and painstaking life.

Her whole youth was full of nervous, irrepressible fears—fears of nothing really fearful, but which were terrible tortures to one of her susceptibility and imagination. She says, "I was afraid of everybody I saw, but was not in the least afraid of God."

She had an idea that no one cared for her, and in desperation she several times contemplated suicide so as to "make somebody care something for her in some way." Her sense of justice was so terribly acute, it was perfect misery to her to see servants, children, and all the helpless class imposed upon and unkindly treated by those who ruled over them.

The great need of children's innumerable questions is exemplified by an incident she narrates of her conception of a spring-gun. Until she was twenty years old she imagined it to be a pea-green musket used only in spring! And the tale of a neighbor about a fallen star obstructing his path one morning as he was coming there—a pure globe of crystal—bewildered her ideas of astronomy for many a year.

Of her religious belief at the age of twenty she says: "I believed in a God, milder, more beneficent, and passionless than the God of the orthodox, inasmuch as he would not doom any of his creatures to eternal torment. I did not at any time, I think, believe in a devil. . . . I believed in inestimable and eternal rewards of holiness; but I am confident that I never in my life did a right thing, or abstained from a wrong one, from any consideration of reward or punishment. . . . I always feared sin and remorse . . . but desired punishment or anything else that would giv me the one good that I pined for—ease of conscience."

When about eleven years old she ventured to ask her brother James, of whom she stood in much awe, "How, if God foreknew everything, we could be blamed or rewarded for our conduct, which was absolutely settled for us beforehand?" Her brother kindly put her off by telling her it was a thing she was not old enough to understand, but this naturally only made the injustice of the whole thing more patent to her, and confirmed her in her tendency to skepticism.

I would like to dwell longer upon these incidents of mental and moral growth, but could not tell the one-hundredth part of the interesting episodes of her child-life in mere newspaper articles, so will hasten on to later developments.

One fact is mentioned by Harriet Martineau which proves that the world has moved along at quite a rapid rate as regards granting to woman a right to read, study, and improve her mind. Of this when she was growing up (some sixty years ago) she says: "When I was young it was not thought proper for young ladies to study very conspicuously; and especially with pen in hand . . . they were expected to sit down in the parlor to sew, during which reading aloud was permitted, or to practice their music; but so as to be fit to receive callers, without any signs of blue-stockingism which could be reported abroad. . . . Jane Austen herself was compelled by the feelings of her family to cover up her manuscript with large pieces of muslin work whenever any genteel people came in."

Since then we find a great growth, and now women are expected to know and to show that they do know. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

Pertinent Questions.

Did you ever ask yourself, why should the thing called government do anything? And then if you are democratic, you may ask why should there be any state or ceremony, fuss and feathers, about government's doings? Individuals nowadays do some considerable actions quietly and with utmost simplicity. But everything done by government is accompanied with brass band, drum, and flag. Nay, the man who is supposed to do the business, be it never so simple, must hav a handle to his name. A good business man once said that all the necessary business of this government could be transacted by one skilful manager for $5,000,000 per year, and that he could save a splendid fortune out of it. He meant the necessary civil business. I believe he is right, because as late as A.D. 1842 it was done very extravagantly for $4,500,000, and it was not until after the war was over that the cost of our civil list exceeded $30,000,000, and soon thereafter the cost jumped up to over $70,000,000. I believe him, because John C. Calhoun declared, and all the great senators of his day acquiesced in it, that the cost of our civil list should not even double as our population doubles, because that would finally overthrow the government, and yet ours has increased to eighteen times more than it was in 1840–50. I believe it, because a certain sum appropriated for congressmen's incidental expenses was originally less than $150 per head, had risen to some $900 per head, which the men of 1840 thought was horribly extravagant, and yet to-day has grown to exceed $4,000 per head. See congressional speeches on appropriation bills 1842–5.

To return to the first question. Government performs certain duties because it is for the public good. War, peace, boundaries, are the first things to occupy governments. It will be noticed by the student that what we call bad governments hav delegated some of these duties to families. or neglected and allowed individuals to do them. Even war has been conducted by heads of great houses in the feudal ages, and religion has been monopolized by families or individuals. To this day there are families in Europe whose heads are hereditary lawmakers.

One of the plainest duties of governments to-day is road making and repairing. But in the earliest ages how people must hav laughed at the idea of a government concerning itself about roads; as well concern itself about the men's breeches, would hav been the first thought at hearing of such a thing. Why so then, and why such a different opinion now? Simply because, in progress of time, the crooked paths of tribes became roads over which traffic rolled. Good roads became public needs, and good governments would not permit a few persons to take advantage of the public necessity and compel all the people to pay tribute to them.

Very early money became a public necessity and was provided by the governments. In all times a few men hav tried to administer to this need, and owing to our ignorance of the fact that money is a representativ of public credit (i. e., confidence), hav been very successful in monopolizing it.

Among the last of duties for government to perform is carrying the mail and distributing letters, papers, packages! Certainly it would hav made the gentlemen of feudal ages laugh uproariously if they had been told that one of their 4x6 states had undertaken the business of one of their hostlers. But see how the demand grew up. Bad roads called for better; better roads invited commerce; commerce demanded more ways of travel, and the very best ways; these introduced more travel and migration, and all these created demand for speedy communication. This insignificant thing of message-sending became a great public necessity. Postage, dear at first, so costly that it was prohibitory on the common people, was reduced to a mere nothing. And behind that ridiculous penny-post bill—immortal be his memory who originated and introduced it, Rowland Hill—behind that, as though imprisoned, fettered and waiting for the magic wand to release them, came bursting on the world cheap paper, daily newspapers, cheap publications, rapid transit, miraculous presses, inventions without number. Yes; to the world as it was then, dear postage was like ice—binding all motion and thought. The consequences of that cheap postage and some other things hav so changed the modes of doing that other public needs hav arisen. Chief above all, the railway service has come to abolish all other modes of carriage. Unfortunately, and especially so for a people scattered over a continent, this service is entirely administered by individuals, so that the most imperativ public necessity that has ever arisen is as much monopolized as though its owners had a patent on locomotion. Instead of developing, as did the mail, for the public good, the evolution has been for private greed. Unlike the street-car monopoly, which always has a competitor in the customers' legs, it has no competition. Its charges are prohibitory on the masses, four-fifths of whom are women and minors. Its net profits are gathered off the great producing districts and carried to distant points for distribution, leaving these districts to pine and wither under a system of absenteeism cruel as that of Irish landlords. When the change comes, as it must, when the people can journey at will, then shall be witnessed a revolution far more astounding than the consequences of penny postage. The people must be carried by the ton as freight regardless of distance. Where one million people now travel several trips per year, a hundred million souls will journey for pleasure who now never dream of it. Double tracks, a hundred cars to one now, millions traveling and receiving the education travel givs. This world was made, this government was created, especially for the masses. Why shall a few men hav the exclusiv right to coin into dollars for themselvs all the mighty value that naturally develops by the consuming and producing power of these millions?

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

R. B. WESTBROOK, President.

OTTO WETTSTEIN, Treasurer.

Important Notice.

Mr. E. A. Stevens having peremptorily resigned the office of secretary of the American Secular Union and retired from its service September 1st, it became necessary to transfer the office from Chicago to Philadelphia in order that the correspondence and business of the society might be, for the present, conducted by, or under the direction of, the chief executiv officer. All communications relating to the affairs of the Union should, until the meeting of the Congress, be addressed to the president, as indicated below, and all remittances of money should be made to Mr. Otto Wettstein, treasurer, at Rochelle, Ill., or to save time, directly to the president at Philadelphia. All persons who made pledges of money at the Pittsburgh congress, or since and elsewhere, which hav not been paid, are most urgently requested to remit the same at the earliest possible moment, and an earnest appeal for financial help, so much needed at this time, is hereby made to all the friends of our beloved Union. It is deemed proper to state that no differences hav arisen between the late laborious and efficient secretary and the other officers relating to the business of the Union, and that he carries with him the hearty good wishes of the entire board.

Proceedings of the Washington Constitutional Convention Regarding Church Taxation.

AUG. 7.—The clerk read section 4 as follows:

Sec. 4. The property of the United States, and of the state, counties, school districts, and other municipal corporations, shall be exempt from taxation; and such other property as may be used exclusivly for actual places of religious worship, places of burial not used or held for private or corporate profit, and institutions of purely public character, public libraries, and personal property to any amount not exceeding in value two hundred and fifty dollars to the head of each family, may be exempted from taxation by the legislature, but such exemption shall be only by general law.

Mr. Comegys offered a substitute differing from the original only in that it limited the exemption of church property to $1,000.

Mr. Gowey said the committee had thought that the place, and not a portion of its value, should be exempt from taxation.

Mr. Cosgrove said that the churches were an effectiv police force and should be exempted. He claimed that if the question were submitted to the people they would vote for exemption.

Mr. Crowley did not believe in exempting church property, though they do a great deal of good and very little harm. If churches are exempted, why not exempt Masonic and Odd Fellows' property? There are many churches that will become rich by increase of the value of their large holdings of realty, and there is no reason for exempting them for all time. He was willing to admit that churches were a great moral power in the state, but there was more reason to exempt the property of a head of a family or a widow or the poor generally. If the churches are exempted, then there are a thousand other organizations which should be extended the same benefit. He was willing to hav a limited exemption.

Mr. Godman opposed any exemption, because it was joining state and church, which was contrary to the principles of the government. Though not a member of any church, he helped to support the churches of his town, and would rather pay a portion of their taxes than hav them exempted. "It is dangerous to giv the churches any scope. They hav already begun to try to rule even those who do not believe as they do. They want to stop everything on Sunday, and are battering at the doors of legislation with that end in view. Giv them an inch and they will go a mile. The question has been submitted to the people, and they voted against it."

On motion of Mr. Dyer the committee arose at 12 o'clock, and took a recess until 2 o'clock on motion of Mr. Bowen.

On motion of Mr. Gowey the convention went into the committee of the whole for further consideration of the article on revenue and taxation.

The question before the committee was the substitute of Mr. Comegys that the limit of exemption of church property be fixed at $1,000.

Mr. Dyer warmly opposed the substitute, and Mr. Comegys defended it.

Mr. Hoyt offered an amendment to the substitute limiting the amount of exemption to $5,000.

Mr. Griffitts, though not a church-member, wanted the utmost liberality shown the churches. It would be bad policy to tax church property. It would be a taxation upon the generosity of the citizens.

Mr. Jones said he would support a separate article on the subject. He was willing to submit the question to the people, but he was not willing to vote for it himself.

Mr. Warner would be willing to vote for a $5,000 limit.

Mr. Cosgrove said the churches here were supported by missionary funds from the East. It is the poor who support churches. If the members knew anything about churches they would know this. He wanted hospitals and other associations of like character. He thought that efforts to fix a limit were directed at the Catholic church. "Or at least that statement has been made in print, and made by a man prominent in the movement, to limit exemption."

Judge Hoyt's amendment, fixing a limit at $5,000, was lost by a vote of 30 to 28.

Mr. Buchanan favored leaving the matter to the legislature.

Mr. Weir thought the statement that exemption of church property would be in effect uniting church and state was absurd.

T. M. Reed was against the taxation of church property, but thought the matter should be left to the legislature.

Mr. Stiles said that all property, private in its nature, should be taxed, and all public property should be exempt. He thought that public charities should by all means be exempt. He said no mention had been made by the committee as to exempting educational institutions. These are more entitled to exemption than churches. Both schools and private charities are an aid to the people. There are a hundred associations that do good, but nothing is said about exempting them. The church is not in any sense educational. It is for religious growth, and if it goes beyond it, it transcends the word of God. He did not believe the adherents of the church were demanding exemption for church property. He had a petition signed by one hundred and eighty-five taxpayers of Tacoma protesting against the exemption of church property. The name of Rev. W. E. Copeland headed the list.

Mr. Comegys said the nation was not Christian; we know nothing about churches. If I had time I could show that the specific statement is made in one of the treaties that we are not a Christian nation. His substitute, fixing the limit at $1,000, was then read and defeated.

Mr. Godman then moved that section 4 of the minority report be adopted as a substitute, as follows:

Sec. 4. Property of the United States and property of the state and counties, property of municipalities, public school property, cemeteries not owned or used for private or corporate profit, and public libraries shall be exempt from taxation. Growing crops and personal property to any amount not exceeding in value $250 to the head of each family may be exempted from taxation by the legislature. The legislature may provide for deduction of creditors.

On motion of Mr. Gowey, the last sentence was stricken out. The substitute was lost. Vote, 33 to 26.

Mr. Dickey moved to amend section 4 as reported by the majority, so as to exempt church property and not leave it to the legislature. Lost.

Amendment voted down.

On motion of Mr. Griffitts the section was amended to read as follows:

Sec. 4. The property of the United States and of state, counties, school districts, and other municipal corporations and such other property as the legislature may by general laws provide.

A vote was taken to Griffitts's amendment to section 4 and it was concurred in by the following vote:

Ayes: Blalock, Buchanan, Burk, Coey, Cosgrove, Dickey, Dunbar, Durie, Dyer, Eldridge, Fay, Glasscock, Griffitts, Henry, Jamison, Jones, Joy, Kellogg, Kinnear, Lillis, Landsley, McCroskey, McElroy, McReavy, Minor, Moore, J. Z. (Spokane), Morgan, Newton, Power, Prosser, Reed, T. M. (Thurston), Reed, J. M. (Whitman), Schooley, Shoudy, Sohns, Stiles, Tibbets, Weir, Weisenburger, West, Winsor. Ayes 42.

Noes: Berry, Bowen, Clothier, Comegys, Crowley, Godman, Gowey, Gray, Hicks, Morey, McDonald, More, R. S. (Pierce), Neace, Sharpstein, Stevenson, Sturdevant, Suksdorf, Sullivan, E. H. (Whitman), Turner, Van Name, Warner, Willison, Mr. President. Noes 23.

J. Z. Moore moved to amend section 4 so as to exempt only the property used exclusivly for charitable or religious purposes. Lost 37 to 109.

Mr. Comegys moved to amend section 4 by exempting church property to the value of $3,000 and household property not exceeding $500. Lost 45 to 18.

All amendments offered in the committee of the whole were repeated, but none carried.

The article was then read for a third time and finally adopted by a vote of 41 to 17.

Comments on the Washington Constitution.

W. S. Bush in Freethought.

The work of the constitutional convention is so far completed that the provisions of the constitution in regard to Secularism may be considered settled. They are:

1. A recognition of "the supreme ruler" of the universe. This is a bid for the church vote, on the part of Judge Turner and others.

2. That an oath or affirmation may be administered in the form most binding on the conscience of the witness. This is the statutory provision in force to-day.

3. Freedom of conscience.

4. "No public money or property shall be appropriated for or applied to any religious worship, exercise, or instruction, or the support of any religious establishment."

5. "No religious qualification shall be required for any public office or employment, nor shall any person be incompetent as a witness, or juror, in consequence of his opinion on matters of religion, nor be questioned in any court of justice touching his religious belief to affect the weight of his testimony."

The question of the taxation of church property was disposed of by an amendment which left the whole question of exemption with the legislature. Hence if a legislature favorable to the exemption of church property is elected, legislation of that kind can be enacted. Nor need the exemption stop at that point. All property owned by religious societies, and used for school and benevolent purposes, can be exempted. The plea is made that these organizations are devoted to charitable purposes, and thus save the public treasury. But it is equally true that they are under private ownership, subject to private management, and so long as the private individuals who control them choose to limit their aid or charity to a part of the community, the state has no control. The fact is that every homestead which is exempted from sale on execution so far protects the family from being thrown upon the poor fund of the state. The extension of this principle of exemption from taxation to homesteads is demanded quite as much as church exemption. The capital invested in the home is dead capital. It is for the public good that families hav a roof-tree they can call their own, where they can feel secure, and from which they cannot be forced upon the street, either at the will of a creditor or of the collector of taxes.

The new constitution authorizes the legislature to exempt any property used for church or private benevolent purposes. On the other hand, it provides for only partial homestead exemption. The article on that point reads: "The legislature shall protect by law from forced sale a certain portion of the homestead and other property of all the heads of families."

This provision is only for the "heads of families"—a phrase which has been construed by our conservativ judges to apply only to married men. Only a "portion" is exempt. . . .

Another County Heard From.

From a Letter by Secretary Wylie of the National Reform Association.

The constitution of Washington is rather unique in its acknowledgment of God. It begins: "We, the people of the state of Washington, with profound reverence for the Supreme Ruler of the Universe," etc. In the estimation of some, this form is preferable to that employed in the North Dakota and Montana constitutions. The Supreme Ruler of the Universe is the Lord Jesus Christ. This is, therefore, an acknowledgment of Christ as King. But this was not in the mind of the convention. From personal interviews with members I am led to believe that it is very much like the inscription Paul once saw on an altar in Athens: "To the unknown God." The Washington convention did not know whether the Supreme Ruler is Force, Law, Baal, Allah, Almighty God, or Jesus Christ. I felt a burning desire to tell them as Paul told the Athenians, "Whom ye ignorantly worship, him declare I unto you." But it remains true that Jesus Christ is the Supreme Ruler of the Universe whether the Washington convention knows it or not. It is something to hav an acknowledgment of the Divine Ruler in such a form as in the minds of intelligent Christians refers to Christ. It is something to hav any acknowledgment of God at all. Such acknowledgments may be misinterpreted by some; they may not be allowed that fulness of meaning, by the masses, which they ought to possess. Yet they are a witness to the fact, not only that men believe in God, but also that this belief is the chief corner-stone of all human government. Mr. Comegys, of the Washington convention, declares himself to be an Agnostic. He opposes every recognition of God by civil government. When reminded that in many ways we do already acknowledge him, as for example by the inscription on our coins, "In God we trust," he replied that the coin itself is the God in whom we trust. He interprets the expression, "Supreme Ruler of the Universe," to mean "Force," or "Law," or "the Nature of things." Doubtless the expression, "Ruler of Nations," in his mind would mean the people composing the nations.—Christian Statesman.

Bruno.

To the Right Reverend Herbert, Bishop of Salford, of the Roman Catholic church: In a pastoral issued to the clergy, secular and regular, and to the faithful of your diocese, which pastoral has been read in the Lancashire Roman Catholic churches and was communicated by you to the press, it is declared that there are two great public objects which should move those whom you address to fervent prayer. The first of these objects, and it is with this alone I propose to deal in this letter, is "the Roman revolution." On this subject you say:

> There is the diabolical persecution carried on against the church in Rome by the Italian Freemasons and revolutionists. As on one occasion during the great French Revolution, of which the centenary is being celebrated to-day in Paris, God and religion were dishonored by placing a naked harlot amid flowers upon an altar in Notre Dame, there to receive the public homage of the multitude as the "goddess of reason," so in the holy city of Rome, in one of the principal squares, last Whit-Sunday was chosen for the perpetration of a deed of iniquity worthy only of the impure and Antichristian revolution and of the powers of hell.

Your reference to the Fete of Reason of 1793 is a fair specimen of your capacity for distorting the truth. Mlle. Maillard was not naked, and I am unaware that there is the smallest shadow of justification for the foul appellation you use. Lamartine in his "History of the Girondists" tells the story with no kind of favor to Chaumette and his friends. Louis Blanc, carefully verifying the facts, gives his view in the chapter "L'Hebertisme" in his "Historie de la Revolution." Thomas Carlyle is hostil enough in his "carmagnole complete." But none of these corroborate your "naked harlot." Nay, Alison himself, though sparing neither innuendo nor attack, writes of her as "a veiled female arrayed in blue drapery." You, a bishop of a great church, step out of your way to unnecessarily and most wantonly insult a dead woman.

It is unfortunate that the persistent and cruel excesses of your church against Freethinkers and heretics hav sometimes provoked reprisals which I should prefer had been avoided; it is, however, clear that to you reason could scarcely appeal, and that the spirit of fair play to your enemies is a quality conspicuously absent from your pastoral.

What is the "deed of iniquity" of which you complain? It is that in Rome, on June 9th, thousands of the Italian people assembled in orderly fashion within the very walls of the city to inaugurate a monument in the Campo dei Fiori to the memory of one of the many thousands done to death by your cruel, your merciless, church. On Feb. 17, 1600, almost three centuries ago, your holy Inquisition caused Giordano Bruno to be burnt to ashes in that very field of flowers.

Your pastoral goes on:

> The Italian revolution, in hatred of the pope and of religion, on the feast of Whit-Sunday publicly set up its idol in the Campo dei Fiori, and its orators proclaimed that it had been carefully selected as representativ of the ideal and aim of regenerated Italy. Giordano Bruno is that idol, an apostate monk of the sixteenth century. No matter if he wrote a system of philosophy so obscure, so irrational and stupid, that no one, even of his admirers, attempts to follow or defend it; no matter if he was condemned by all his contemporary Protestant reformers, whether in Switzerland or Germany, as well as by the Catholic church. He is the chosen idol and pattern of the Italian revolution, because, as they tell us, he declared war against all who would impose any restraint upon the mind or will of man. The mind and will of man, he proclaimed, were absolutely free; whosoever checks or controls them in their action, either by law or by force, is a tyrant and enemy to be destroyed. Holding this as a fundamental doctrin, he logically attacked religion, revelation, the vicar of Christ, and God himself. They all imposed restraint, they were all tyrants. His morals were on a par with his blasphemous Infidelity and Atheism. He wrote the most impure and obscene plays imaginable (which his followers are again putting on the Italian stage), openly proclaiming the nullity of marriage and the lawfulness of the most shocking excesses.

Your Inquisition made no charge against Giordano Bruno that he wrote "impure and obscene plays." Even if this charge had been true, burning alive is a heavy penalty. But the documents preserved show clearly enough that Giordano Bruno was arrested on the denunciation of Zuane Mocenigo, and accused of heresy, and of heresy alone. The record of his examination before the Inquisition at Venice shows that the books as to which he was interrogated were most certainly not "impure and obscene plays." Frith, in his life of "Giordano Bruno, the Nolan," gives the following extract:

> Being asked on the 2d of June, in presence of D. Sebastian Bardico, if he had a memorandum of all the books which he had printed, and if he remembered their subjects and doctrin, Bruno responded: "I hav made a list of all those books which I hav given to be printed, and also of those which I hav composed and which are not yet printed, and which I was revising to giv them to the press as soon as I should hav opportunity, either at Frankfort or elsewhere, the which note and list is this. . . . The subject of all these books, speaking generally, is philosophical matter, differing according to the titles of said books; as may be seen in them all, I hav always defined things philosophically, and according to natural principles and the light of nature, not having regard chiefly to that which ought to be held according to the faith; and I believe that nothing can be found in them by which I can be condemned for professing rather to desire to attack religion than to exalt philosophy, although I may hav uttered many impious things founded on my natural light."

The Standard newspaper, commenting on the papal allocution, states the case accurately, clearly, and distinctly, in its leading article of July 14th:

> What is the occasion of this new ebullition of papal wrath, which seems to recall the worst exploits of Pius IX.? The reason openly alleged by Leo XIII. for declaring that the papacy has been outraged by the Italian government is the erection of a statue to Giordano Bruno in the Campo dei Fiori, in the Eternal City, on the spot on which, in the year 1600, he was burnt as a heretic. One would hav thought that even the ultramontane world would not hav been anxious to assume inherited responsibility for that atrocious and revolting crime, but would hav had the good sense to keep its peace while the friends of liberty of thought were commemorating an event which is one of the darkest blots on the reputation of the Roman church. But, with a candor that is astounding, the pope retrospectivly justifies the barbarous burning of a great thinker for his opinions because they were not the opinions of the papacy; and a considerable portion of the Roman Catholic world follows in the footsteps of the pontiff, and protests that Rome is desecrated by the erection of a monument to the last victim of religious bigotry. Even the Roman Catholic Union of Great Britain, with the duke of Norfolk at its head, deems it its duty to clamor against what the rest of mankind regards as a tardy and imperfect act of reparation. The case is a crucial one. Giordano Bruno was burnt, and burnt by the head of the Roman Catholic church, for heretical opinions, and for heretical opinions alone. It is true he had written of the papacy, as he had written of many other things and people, in violent and contemptuous language. But even the sacred college would scarcely hav the courage to say that Bruno was done to death for disrespectful phrases. This, then, is the issue. He was burnt for heretical opinions; and the world is divided into those who regret and execrate the deed, and those who approve and exult in it. It may be as astonishing as it is disappointing; but there is no shirking the obvious conclusion. The pope and those who agree with him consider Giordano Bruno had his deserts. It is hardly an exaggeration to say, that the legitimate inference is that if they had the power, they would again pile up the fagots and thrust in the torch, as a punishment for holding opinions on certain abstruse points in which they themselvs do not happen to participate.

You write:

> It is said (though no judicial proof of the fact has been brought forward) that he received his deserts by having been publicly burnt for his crimes in Rome in the year 1600.

Do you intend by this to deny that there is judicial proof that Bruno was under arrest at Venice, and that on Sept. 17, 1592, Cardinal de San Severina applied formally for the delivery of the body of Giordano Bruno to the holy office at Rome? Do you deny that on Jan. 7, 1593, there is a decree signed by Pasquale Cicogna, doge of Venice, handing over Bruno to the tribunal of the holy Inquisition? It is true that from 1593 until 1599 there is a blank, and we can only guess how your church treated Bruno, its prisoner; but do you deny that on Jan. 14, 1599, there is judicial proof that the charges of heresy against Giordano Bruno were formally before the congregation of the Inquisition? Do you deny that there is judicial proof that on Feb. 8, 1590, Bruno was led from the prison in Santa Maria della Minerva to hear the reading of the sentence against him?

Your pastoral is worthy your church in its darkest ages. You shamelessly boast to-day that Bruno "received his deserts" when he suffered his martyrdom at the stake. Public opinion renders it impossible for you any longer to burn the living, but your bigotry survives to employ calumny and slander against the dead in lieu of the rack and fagot, which were your loving arguments three hundred years ago.

It is true that I hav but little claim to plead for Bruno. He was religious; I am not. Your church burnt him for heresy, and I am heretic. Your church and you denounce him as Atheist, and this am I. Two hundred and eighty-nine years ago he was sentenced by your Cardinal Santorio, San Severina, the same who described the bloody St. Bartholomew as "the celebrated day of St. Bartholomew, most joyful to Catholics." At the end of the nineteenth century, I, honored by the bitter personal antagonism of the head of your church in England, am thus made worthy at least to smite your slanderous lips when they impeach the memory and libel the life of the Freethought martyr, Giordano Bruno.—Charles Bradlaugh.

Lectures and Meetings.

CHARLES WATTS will lecture in Wisconsin and Iowa during October, and parties in those states wishing to hear him may obtain his services by addressing him.

W. F. JAMIESON is lecturing in Nebraska, and expects to visit Kansas; will giv a couple of lectures in Wamego, and perhaps in Valley Falls. His address is Hay Springs, Neb.

WE solicit all of our readers in the Northwest who can attend the convention of the Oregon state Secular Union to do so. It will be held at Portland, Ore., at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, October 12th, 13th, and 14th. It is aimed to hav the convention participated in not by Oregon Freethinkers alone, but by those of Washington also, and even, if possible, by those of all the new states. The object is to secure the total separation of church and state. Liberal orators and workers of every kind will be there. Surely the noble efforts just put forth by many Freethought veterans in the new states will induce in all a desire to meet and see those workers for us, and grasp their hands. Contributions, and communications of all kinds, will be received by the board of directors, C. Beal, A. F. Neunert, J. K. Sears, Lee Laughlin, L. Ames.

Pretty Fancies.

From the New York Herald.

Mr. Robert G. Ingersoll, who has visited Palmer's Theater more than once to see "Clover," yesterday sent Manager Ben Stevens, of the company, a note, in which the following among other things were penned: "A wonderful word is 'clover.' Drop the c and you hav the happiest of mankind. Take away the c and r and you hav the only thing that makes a heaven of this dull, barren earth. Cut off the r alone and there remains a warm, deceitful bud that sweetens breath and keeps peace in countless homes, whose masters frequent clubs. After all Bottom was right: 'Good hay, sweet hay, hath no fellow.'"

Heathen Morality and Bible Morality.

From the Australian Radical.

In accordance with my promis to Robert P. Simpson, and your readers, I produce some of the moral maxims of ancient sages who lived hundreds of years before the Bible of Christianity was heard of.

R. P. S. says in the Newcastle Herald: "I challenge L. T. or any other person to send to my private sanctum a heathen production with such ordinances and moral precepts as are to be found in the Bible." He appears to think there are no moral precepts except what may be found in the Bible, but so far is this from being correct, that it may be safely said that there is not one moral precept in the whole Bible but which may be found in books written ages before the Bible saw the light. In proof of this I giv the following from a work published by J. Watson, Queenshead Passage, London (by B. F. Powell), entitled "Bible of Reason; or, Scriptures of Ancient Moralists." I begin with Aristotle, who was one of the greatest philosophers in ancient times. He was born three hundred and eighty-four years before Christ, was versed in every science then known, and illustrated them in his writings and teachings. He says:

A virtuous life is in itself a source of delight.

Disgraceful indulgences are unworthy of being named pleasures.

The noblest employment of the mind is in the study of nature and truth.

True happiness consists in the most disinterested and impartial action of the miud and in the practice of all the social duties.

Vice is sufficient of itself to make a man thoroughly unhappy.

Where in the Bible is there a more correct maxim than this:

Justice is the virtue of rendering every man his due.

The following is the Golden Rule, so called because it is considered the best in the New Testament:

We should conduct ourselvs toward others as we would expect them to act toward ourselvs.

These are only a very few of the teachings of Aristotle, but they are not surpassed by anything found in the Bible.

Cicero, born one hundred and five years before Christ, has one hundred and eighty-one maxims and aphorisms. I giv a few of the gems found in his works.

The knowledge of the truth is a man's highest attainment.

Reason and truth should be more regarded by us than vulgar opinion.

Of all villainy none is more capital than that of those who, when they deceive, do it under the cloak of intended truth and righteousness.

Virtue requires no other recompense than the tribute of self-approbation and respect . . . our own conscience is the proper sphere of satisfaction.

We should always act in a way so as to be able to render satisfactory reasons for our conduct. This rule defines almost the extent of our duties.

Justice consists in doing no injury to men: civility in giving them no offense. We should be as careful of our words as our actions: as far from speaking as acting ill.

It is the conscience that takes vengeance of the wicked.

No man ought to take advantage of another's simplicity to gain aught for himself.

Our whole conduct should be regulated according to a sense of propriety . . . our deportment should be free from rudeness and vulgarity.

We should liv with our fellow-citizens as with equals, without obsequiousness or meanness.

We should desire nothing but what is right, and contribute by our example to the maintenance of good order in society, and everyone should conform to this good order.

Of two evils we should not only choose the least, but endeavor still to derive some advantage even out of that.

To err is human, but a fool will only persist in error.

Without order, a family, a city, a nation, mankind, nature, the infinit world, could not exist.

It is the part of a firm and virtuous man not to repent having done his duty, even though he should see as a reward preparations in train to make him suffer for it.

Such were some of the noble maxims of Cicero, who was beheaded forty-three years before the Christian era.

Chinese philosophers hav never been under the influence of or dominated by the Bible and Christianity, but the moral maxims of Chinese authors who knew nothing of the Bible or its contents are equal to any found in any other part of the world, as witness the following:

To succor the needy, to protect innocence, to instruct and guide erring humanity: such are the virtues that yield a man satisfaction, and render him useful to his fellow-beings.

The man who wishes perfectly to fulfil his duties, should study the precepts and imitate the example of the good.

How truly noble is he whom neither honors nor disgrace can cause to deviate for an instant from a perfect and proper course.

To conquer ourselvs is the means for us not to be overcome by others, to be masters of ourselvs is the way not to hav other masters.

A small relief given opportunely and in extreme need, does more good than a hundred ill-bestowed gratuities.

He is truly rich who knows how to make his expenses conform to his income.

Feel neither aversion nor disdain toward those whose minds are deficient; expect not men to be perfect in all respects. To conceal the faults of others, and publish their virtues . . . this is the way to make ourselvs beloved.

We should never believe evil of anyone without positiv proof.

If we doubt the justice of an action, we ought to abstain from doing it.

Never confide in him who says "Yes" and "No" in the one breath.

The way to enjoy domestic comfort is to correct what is wrong in one's family with a mild firmness, and by overlooking what is offensiv in our neighbors, we shall be able to liv on a friendly footing with them.

The duty of a father is to correct the faults of his children, the mother should feel for their weakness without too much connivance.

The burdens of life are borne more easily when we mutually assist each other.

The above maxims from Chinese authors display a deep knowledge of human nature, and experience confirms their correctness. We will add a few from Confucius, the great philosopher of China, who was born 554 B.C. His influence in China is supreme, and his practical maxims of life hav never been surpassed. He says:

We should let our reason and not our passions be the rule of our conduct, for reason will lead us to think correctly, to speak sensibly, and to act justly.

No man can possess knowledge of every kind, but everyone ought to learn what pertains to his duty.

Whatever is both honest and advantageous is proper and becoming, and we are attached to virtue because it includes both these qualities. Virtue is an ornament that sets off the whole person of him who possesses it—his exterior and his interior—to the mind it communicates inexpressible beauties and perfections. To the body it produces delightful sensations . . . it is the property of virtue to calm the heart and preserve peace there, so this inward tranquillity and secret joy produce a certain serenity in the countenance, an air of goodness, kindness, and considerateness which attracts everyone's esteem.

Let us be unremitting in our endeavor to acquire new virtues, and never be satisfied merely with those we hav already attained.

The wise man seeks for the cause of his errors in himself; the fool, excusing himself, seeks for it in others.

Sincerity of heart is the first of virtues; nothing is so indispensable in the commerce of society as sincerity.

In our opportunities for enriching ourselvs we should never lose sight of honesty.

The Bible tells us the sins of the father shall be visted upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. This doctrin that the children shall suffer for sins they never committed—in other words, the innocent shall suffer for the guilty, is one of the most atrocious doctrins ever invented, and is condemned by the whole civilized world; and Confucius, who is denounced as a pagan and a heathen, taught a doctrin far superior to this. He says:

The defects of parents ought never to be visited on their children. If a father by his faults renders himself unworthy of respect the son ought not to be despised if he do not render himself personally odious. The father's folly and misconduct cannot justly affect the merits of his son nor deprive him of respect.

A child is in duty bound to love and obey his parents.

An amiable woman is a source of satisfaction and happiness to her family.

An honest heart makes an open countenance.

The number of excellent precepts (122) offer a tempting field for further quotations from Confucius, but I close with the following, which I invite Mr. Simpson to surpass from any portion of the scriptures:

Strive to be pure in thought. If our mind is free from evil our actions will be also; let us never intend, much less commit, a wrong act.

Return a good deed by the like, but never revenge an injury.

To return good for evil, and not to resent injuries, can only be the act of a great mind.

And the following is the Golden Rule, so much vaunted because it is found in the New Testament:

Maxim 52. Is there any one maxim by which a man may regulate his whole life? It is simply to act toward others as we would desire they should act toward us. We need but this rule alone; it is the foundation and the principle of all our duties.

One more:

We should be careful in our own dwellings and should do nothing at home for which we might blush were it known abroad.

Confucius died 478 B.C. Without affirming that Confucius was perfect in all he did and said, yet considering the age in which he lived his moral teachings were of so pure and elevating a character that it need excite no wonder to find that he is held in the highest esteem among the hundreds of millions of his countrymen and others for his pure and lofty morality.

In addition to Aristotle, Cicero, and Confucius, who all taught doctrins and moral precepts which hav never been surpassed, we find other ancient sages giving expression to equally lofty sentiments who never either heard or dreamed of the Bible or Christianity. We giv a few gems from Democritus, a celebrated philosopher who was born 460 B.C.:

The end of all our moral attainments is tranquillity of mind.

Tranquillity or peace of mind, which is also called wisdom, is a thing so desirable that its value is beyond all estimate. Possessing it we wonder at nothing, we fear nothing, and we enjoy everything, for when we know how properly to frame our manners, order our actions, and moderate our desires, we are continually happy.

Profligacy, or vicious indulgence in sensuality, depraves the very talents which nature has not denied us.

He who enjoys what he has without regretting the want of what he has not, is a happy man.

It is the office of prudence to avoid being injured if possible, but after an injury has been received a regard for our own tranquillity will preserve us from a desire for revenge.

Temperance augments enjoyment; the worst disease of the mind is insatiable avarice.

A good man cares not for the abuse of bad men.

We had better blame our own faults than those of others.

Diogenes, who was born 413 B.C., was a Greek philosopher, and though his writings hav not been preserved he left a few excellent moral maxims:

The end of philosophy is to subdue the passions, and to qualify us for every condition in life. No event can happen for which the philosopher is not prepared.

Liberty is the greatest good and the foundation of all the rest.

Covetousness is the metropolis of all the vices.

When we stretch forth our hand to a friend we should never clutch our fist.

Against passion we must oppose reason.

How can death be an evil, as it is never felt when it is death?

Would you be avenged of an enemy—be virtuous, that he may hav nothing to say against you.

Epicurus, another Greek philosopher, was born 342 B.C. He was the founder of the Epicurean sect, and whatever might be said of his philosophy, "it is a gross mistake," says R. S. Davenport in his Biographical Dictionary, "to suppose that Epicurus was a vicious man, and that he recommended vicious practices. On the contrary, his conduct was virtuous, and the pleasure which he taught his pupils to pursue was that pleasure which was attained by virtue alone." From his two hundred and thirty-two moral maxims we select a few only.

Morals comprise the whole range of human conduct; the practice of justice forms the most weighty obligation of man toward man, and justice consists in committing no injury against the person, property, or character of another, nor offending against another's sensibility or comfort.

The object of life by the tacit consent of all men is felicity, and since almost all men miss that end, must it not be the fact that they use not the right means to attain it?

The most philosophical desire is, that life should consist in a succession of pleasing emotions, and death be considered an event neither to be coveted nor feared.

When we say that pleasure is the sovereign good, enjoyment the chief end of life, we are far from meaning the pleasure, or rather indulgences, of voluptuousness, or those which consist in gross, excessiv, and pernicious gratifications, as some hav maliciously represented, for it is not riot and dissipation, nor the other consuming excitements of the senses, which render life really pleasant, but it is the sober exercise of reason.

What we hav affirmed is, that the way to a happy life is to enjoy as much of the good and suffer as little of the evil incident to human nature as possible.

Supreme enjoyment exists in morals, and in freedom of life, when it is consistent with the dictates of reason.

Temperance, or the regulation of our desires and passions, enables us to enjoy pleasure without suffering and consequent inconvenience.

All excess is incompatible with health and with happiness.

A happy life consists not so much iu pampering the appetites as in the exercise of reason with sobriety and a sound mind.

We cannot be happy without being prudent, or worthy without being just, and to be prudent, benevolent, and just is to be happy. This must be the chief quality of our character.

Death, that word which makes the vulgar shrink, does not harm us, for as long as we are alive it is not death, and when it is death we are no longer alive.

A man who is perpetually conversant with the blessings which reason can bestow, seems to be superior to the rest of mankind.

Our time should be made useful, instead of spending it in melancholy reflections on our mortality.

A sober or well-ordered reason procures a pleasant and happy life, by means of the virtues practiced.

We cannot liv pleasantly, unless we liv prudently, honestly, and justly; nor can we liv prudently, honestly, and justly without living pleasantly. The virtues are conatural with a happy life, and it is impossible to separate a happy life from them.

The just liv most free from trouble and disorder, the unjust on the contrary are always disturbed and uneasy.

Of all men he that is the most just enjoys the greatest tranquillity, and he that is the most unjust the least.

The most useful conviction that can be imprinted on the mind of rational beings is that every crime is a certain cause of suffering to him who commits it.

The harm of pleasure is not felt in its enjoyment, but vice is detestable for its evil consequences, virtue is appreciated for the pleasure it produces.

If we liv according to nature we can never be poor, if according to opinion we can never be rich.

We must not only bear with injuries, nor only pardon them mildly, but we should encourage and congratulate him who betakes himself to an improved course of life. We should rejoice with him who having gone astray shall hav returned into the path of virtue.

Those who practice beneficence procure goodwill to themselvs and the tender estimation of others, so we are interested for our own sakes in doing good to others.

The man who is really wise and good will never be otherwise.

Those who make reason and virtue the objects of their choice may truly be congratulated.

Virtue and felicity are sisters never to be found apart.

We shall seek in the Bible in vain for moral maxims superior to the above from Epicurus, who died two hundred and seventy-one years before the alleged birth of Christ.

Socrates, one of the ten Attic orators, was born in Athens 436 B.C. He opened a School of Oratory in which he taught and formed many illustrious speakers and statesmen. Twenty-one of his harangs are preserved which are permeated with wisdom and the highest morality.

Without pretending to giv any maxims which had never before been known or discovered, Socrates said:

The merit of a moral treatis consists in collecting as extensivly as possible the maxims scattered among all nations and placing them in an interesting point of view.

He continues:

We should not be satisfied with merely approving those who do well, but we should emulate their good deeds.

Virtue is profitable for all things, infinitly preferable to riches or birth.

Modesty, diffidence, habits of temperance, and love of justice—these are the virtues that should form the character of young men.

Past experience is the only means by the aid of which opinions may be formed of what shall happen on succeeding occasions.

The power of a tyrant is as heavy a burden on himself as on those he oppresses.

He who holds office should be careful not to employ vicious subordinates, as it is very certain that their bad conduct will be imputed to him.

We should not fancy that vice would answer our purpose better than virtue.

And here again we meet with the Golden Rule between 400 B.C. and 500 B.C., taught by a so-called heathen philosopher:

Do not unto others that which you would not they should do unto you; you will conquer anger if you behave yourself toward offenders as you would hav others behave themselvs toward you when you transgress.

He who would value himself or his honor should be punctual in all his engagements—that more reliance may be placed on his word than the oath of another.

We should avoid whatever may display bad feeling, and attend with civility to what may be addressed to us; all hearts are conciliated by politeness and affability.

It is never becoming to say what it would be shameful to do.

We should be content with our actual condition, without, however, neglecting to improve it if in our power.

Kindnesses shown to us in real distress are remembered the longer.

We should speak only on those occasions when we are well acquainted with our subject, or when silence would be improper. Our affections should be shown by our deeds, rather than by words.

We might fill columns with elegant and moral extracts from Lucretius, Phocylides, Plato, Plutarch, Pythagoras, Seneca, Socrates, Theophrastus, and hosts of others, including Buddha and Brahma, all of whom lived centuries before Christ, and all of whom taught maxims of morality from which the best morality in the Bible has been derived or borrowed. In short, there is not an original moral maxim in the whole of the Christian scriptures—they hav all been appropriated from other sources. And to hear Mr. Simpson, of Wallsend, or any other man say that the morality taught in the Bible is superior to the morality taught at any time and anywhere else simply excites a smile of pity at the condition of ignorance in which such men exist, and the excuse for them is that they unfortunately know no better.

LIBERAL THINKER.

Leo XIII. and Bruno.

From the National Reformer.

I hav only just seen the full text of the allocution of Pope Leo XIII. as delivered at the extraordinary consistory held, at the pope's command, at Rome on June 30th. Some of the papal language is so very extraordinary that it is difficult to pass it by without notice. The consistory was held at the Vatican, exactly three weeks after the inauguration of the monument to Giordano Bruno, and this is how the pope speaks to his cardinals, and to the whole world, of those taking part in the ceremony:

They load with honors a man doubly a fugitiv, a heretic judically condemned, whose boldness attacked the church in his last breath.

At least these words of the supreme head of the Roman Catholic church may be contrasted with the audacious denial by the bishop of Salford, to which I replied in the National Reformer of July 21st, i. e., that "no judicial proof of the fact" was known. The allocution goes on:

Nay, for these very reasons they deemed him worthy of honor; for it is not by any means true that there was in his character any reason for it. He had no special knowledge of science; his writings convict him of Pantheism, proclaimed him a follower of a disgraceful Materialism, and a victim to numberless errors; he is often self-contradictory.

No reason in the character of Bruno for honor? Is there no reason for this honor to be found in Bruno's loyalty to what he believed to be the truth, despite years of hardship and wandering? despite years of prison and torture? despite the fagot itself? Does not his very martyrdom afford all-sufficient reason for the honor done by Freethinkers to his memory? "No special knowledge of science," and yet, to quote the article by C. E. Plumptre, in the Westminster Review, John Kepler "confessed his indebtedness to Bruno," and after pointing to his work, "De l'infinito Universo e Mondi," as the guide to "Bruno's exact place in modern science and philosophy," Mr. Plumptre adds:

If the modern conception of the solar system rightly bears the name of "Copernican," no less rightly, it seems to us, should the modern conception of the sidereal system bear the name of "Brunœan."

And he affirms that,

As much greater as is the discovery of the sidereal system than that of the solar system, so much greater, it seems to us, should Bruno be considered than Copernicus.

Again I let the papal allocution speak:

His virtues were not conspicuous, since in his morality his wickednesses and evil deeds are an everlasting lesson, teaching whither unbridled lusts will lead a man. His deeds were ignoble; he deserved but poorly of the state; his wonted arts were dissimulation, lying, complete selfishness, intolerance of another's opinions, a depraved intellect, and a vulgar spirit.

This reckless imputation of unspecified "evil deeds," "ignoble" deeds, and "unbridled lusts," three centuries after the murder of the bold heretic who attacked the Roman church with his dying breath, should revolt decently minded men. Had Bruno been a man of unbridled lust he might hav well sat on the throne of the Borgia. Had he been the lying dissimulator suggested, he might well hav been bishop of Salford, cardinal of the holy church, or even pope of Rome. "Selfish," this man who voluntarily faced poverty, prison, and death! "A depraved intellect and vulgar spirit," this Bruno who, with the fiery death menacing him, said to the cardinals of the holy office when they sentenced him, "It may be you fear more to deliver judgment upon me than I fear judgment!" CHARLES BRADLAUGH.

The Archbishop's Pastoral.

In all the Catholic churches of the archdiocese of New York, on last Sunday morning, there were read a pastoral letter from Archbishop Corrigan, and the papal allocution of June 30th. The letter reinforces the admonitions of the allocution, which was based on the erection of the statue of Giordano Bruno. The letter reads:

MICHAEL AUGUSTINE

By the grace of God and favor of the Apostolic See, Archbishop of New York, to the clergy of the diocese and the faithful of his charge, health and benediction in the Lord:

DEARLY BELOVED BRETHREN: Nineteen years ago Victor Emmanuel, "the gentleman king," sent an agent to Pope Pius IX. to invite him to surrender the patrimony of St. Peter and the temporal power which secured his independence as the head of the universal church. Without waiting for the letter of the sovereign pontiff in reply to this insolent request to reach him, Victor Emmanuel invaded the papal territory and took forcible possession of Rome. To preserve a show of decency, and to quiet in some measure the outraged feelings of Catholics throughout the world, a royal decree was issued declaring that "the sovereign pontiff preserves his dignity, inviolability, and all the prerogativs of a sovereign." . . .

Judged in the light of subsequent events, these promises of the king and his parliament (paltry as they were, compared with the high handed injustice already committed) were made to be broken. In fact, ever since the occupation of Rome, slowly and stealthily, but yet surely and steadily, the chains hav been wound closer and closer around the successor of St. Peter. The semblance of sovereignty enjoyed by the august prisoner of the Vatican has been encroached upon time and again in various ways, until at length the actual government would openly affirm, if it dared, that the holy father is simply a subject of the king of Italy. More than this, the avowal is now made, and apparently with high official sanction, that not only the temporal, but also the spiritual power of the pontiff must cease to exist. The holy father has more than once called attention to these machinations of his enemies, and most pointedly in an allocution pronounced in a special consistory, held on the 30th of June, a copy of which is herewith appended.

But besides these grave and authoritativ declarations, we hav the confession of the conspirators themselvs. On occasion of the unveiling of the statue of Giordano Bruno, on Pentecost Sunday, Signor Bovio, a deputy to parliament, and the orator of the day, affirmed: "To-day Rome inaugurates the religion of thought, the beginning of another era." The press of Rome is even more outspoken. "On Sept. 20, 1870, the temporal dominion was overthrown; but to-day it is the spiritual dominion itself whose obsequies are celebrated. It is the very soul of the church at whose death we are assisting." In the same sense the latest apologist of Giordano Bruno, in a pamphlet published in Rome July 8th, in reply to the aforesaid allocution of the holy father, adds: "During the Middle Ages, the papacy, even in a political sense, was conceivable. Now that the state is a union of free citizens—of freemen who govern and are governed—the supremacy of the pontiff is impossible, under every respect."

On account, then, of the aim of the revolution to antagonize the Christian religion by attacking, and, if possible, destroying its chief stronghold, the see of Peter, it will be useful to notice the honors lavished on the spirit of rebellion, in the person of Giordano Bruno, and to examin the principle on which his admirers base his claims to distinction.

The project of erecting a statue in Rome to the memory of Bruno, and on the very place of his execution, originated in Turin, shortly after the breach of Porta Pia in 1870. The idea was taken up by the hotheaded youth attending various universities noted as seats of Liberalism. In 1876, under the inspiration of Signor Bovio, whose name has been already mentioned, the "university committee" was formed to carry on the work, which has now culminated in the unveiling of the statue. To make the opposition to Christianity more pronounced, the most noted Atheists and Freethinkers of the world were named members of an honorary international committee. Among the representativs so chosen was Victor Hugo, who says: "Giordano Bruno is a noble victim of thought; I salute his memory with emotion." And Ernest Renan writes: "The thought of erecting an expiatory monument to Giordano Bruno on the very spot of his execution seems to me the personification of justice. We owe a double homage to these heroes of truth, who, at the price of their lives, hav won the liberties we now enjoy. The first duty is to honor their memory; the second, to pursue with redoubled ardor those scientific researches to which we can now devote ourselvs in peace, thanks to their tears, thanks to their blood." The sophisms of these eulogies are apparent.

It is needless to relate the life of Bruno. As the holy father says, there was nothing in it worthy of the honor recently bestowed on his memory. His most ardent admirers hav never claimed that he was a patriot. His teachings, even according to his warmest apologists, were merely a blending of Materialism and Pantheism. His life was most immoral. His one claim to distinction was hatred of Christ our Lord, hatred of the religion which he founded, and of his representativs on earth. In the deliberate attempt to cast a slur on Christianity, and on its chief exponent, the monument to Bruno was thought of, to be erected as a threat at once and a trophy, in the very center and heart of Catholicity. Hence in like manner the selection of the day, of all the days in the year for the unveiling of the statue—the Feast of Pentecost, on which the Christian world commemorates the outpouring of the holy spirit upon the apostles, and the beginning of their glorious mission. Bruno's monument is thus the deification of unbelief. . . .

The church maintains that as truth can never contradict truth, true scientific research can never conflict with divine revelation. But Freethought as advocated by the admirers of Bruno denies the right of a higher and divine authority to command the mind's assent and control its speculations, and constitutes human nature the sole supreme judge of all truth, human and divine. It asserts the absolute independence of the mind of man from all responsibility even to the supreme lord and master of all, discards his revealed word and rejects his authority—in a word, it is the deification of human reason. This doctrin is false in philosophy, false in theology, false in ethics.

First, it is philosophically unsound, because truth sometimes so presents itself to the mind as to claim necessary assent, leaving no room for doubt or rejection. Take certain axioms in mathematics, as, for instance, that a straight line is the shortest distance between two points. In this and similar statements, not only in science but in every department of knowledge, the intellect has no freedom of choice. It assents at once, and, from its very nature, cannot do otherwise. It is not free to dissent. Indeed, properly speaking, freedom does not belong to the mental faculty. In this respect it is important to bear in mind the difference between the intellect and the will. In this life the will cannot be necessitated by any individual good or advantage, however great, because no created good can fully satisfy the capacity of our nature. With the mind, on the contrary, truth, whenever clearly perceived, is irresistible. The acts of our mind follow of necessity; just as, on the other hand, those same acts of the mind are necessarily withheld whenever intrinsic or extrinsic evidence does not place truth within the horizon of our mental vision. If, in the latter case, judgment is pronounced, it is because the will acts upon the mind, and makes it adhere, with more or less foundation, to one statement rather than to another. By analogy, we are in the habit of calling this process of our minds liberty, by a certain derivation from the liberty of the will. Now, if we admit this liberty with regard to everything, as the system under consideration requires, we must admit likewise that the mind never simply perceives truth; or that truth is never so perceived as necessarily to claim intellectual assent. This once admitted, the foundation of all kind of knowledge is undermined, and not only religion, but science itself, falls to the ground. Freethought, therefore, cannot stand the test of philosophical scrutiny.

Second, as a system it rests on untenable suppositions. The moment we raise the banner of Freethought we must hold by the very fact that the Christian creed rests on no solid foundation; that all the reasons which affirm it are at least doubtful; that all the miracles by which it was promulgated were the work of fraud and imposture.

If Freethought be accepted, either the Christian religion contains no truth revealed by God, or these truths, thus revealed, cannot claim the assent of our intellect. In other words, a reasonable being must either examin the credentials of Christianity, and refute them, or, admitting that it is a divine religion, still refuse to adopt it. Neither conclusion is tenable; the first, as involving a difficulty even more inexplicable than the one it repudiates; the second, as inconsistent with right reason.

Third, finally, liberty of thought implies liberty of action, so that moral and physical liberty become distinct only in name. Man, therefore, may deem morally right whatever he can physically perform. It is needless to say how pernicious in its consequences would be the practical application of such doctrin. Now, if it be lawful to think as we please, why cannot we think that virtue and vice are mere names? That property is robbery? That modesty and decorum are but prejudices of education? That treason, self-indulgence, injustice, are to be placed on the same level with patriotism, temperance, and righteousness? Since, therefore, our exterior actions are prompted and guided by our inward thoughts, with principles like those suggested by Freethought, what will human life be in this world? What will become of the family? What of civil society itself? Mere material force, illogically used in similar contingencies, will not suffice to avert threatened evils, or check their baleful progress. Freedom of thought is therefore a fountain of woe in its practical application and its logical results.

And now, dear brethren, the grosser the insults offered to our blessed Lord, the more fervent and devoted in proportion ought to be our love for him, and our care not to offend him ourselvs. In our day and generation one of the most fatal snares laid for the faithful is affiliation with secret societies, that are based on mere naturalism, in exclusion of, and, by inference at least, in opposition to, our divine redeemer. The harm that has come to religion in the Eternal City during the past twenty years is attributed mainly to the workings of secret societies. In our land of freedom there is no need of burrowing in the dark. Much less ought Catholics patronize associations in which the Christian faith and the divinity of Christ our savior are ignored.

Our sympathy also goes out to the vicar of our Lord on earth. We grieve with him for the outrages inflicted on religion. We grieve that Rome, sanctified by the blood of myriad martyrs, has seen the standard of the evil one flaunted through her streets in memory of an apostate whose sole merit was to repeat with Lucifer of old, "I will not serve." In the pain and insult offered to the head all the members necessarily share. In the wrongs done to the sovereign pontiff the faithful of the whole world are assailed; and against such indignities, continued now for nineteen years, all of us, as Catholics, utter our indignant protest.

Finally, let us redouble our supplications to the most high, that he may make the light of his countenance to shine upon us, and hav mercy on us; that he may pour his grace into the hearts of the wayward and the ignorant, that "they may know him, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom he has sent."

The reverend clergy are hereby directed to resume in the mass, and to continue until further notice, the collect pro papa. They will also please read to the faithful under their charge the allocution of June 30th, and announce a solemn triduum of prayer for the intentions of the holy father, to be held on the 6th, 7th, and 8th of September, the exercises consisting of the litany of the blessed virgin and benediction of the most holy sacrament. In accordance with special powers granted by the holy see, and contained in the faculties of the diocese (No. 9), the faithful who will receive holy communion on next Sunday (where the faculty has not already been made use of) may gain a plenary indulgence on the usual conditions.

Jesus Paid—Go Ahead.

The illustration on our first page this week presents the beautiful scene of the translation to heaven of four scoundrels hanged in New York city August 23d. Each had murdered a woman. Each was a good Roman Catholic Christian. Each is at present in heaven, where we cannot get—where, in fact, we hope we won't get, now.

The crimes were as follows. One of these delightful creatures, Carolin, murdered his mistress March 15, 1888, in a little, barely furnished room in the rear of the first floor of 47 Stanton street. Carolin was a carpenter out of work. He threw the woman, Bridget McQuade, down on the floor of his room and hammered her head with a hatchet until she was dead. Since then he denied that he killed the woman. . The second, Jack Lewis, a negro, murdered his mistress, a mulatto named Alice Jackson, on July 17, 1888. He had made a previous attempt to murder her by firing several shots at her. She had refused to liv with him any longer. He was so sure that he had killed her the first time that he fled from the city and remained away until he heard that she was still alive. On the day of the murder he called at 84 West Third street, where she was employed as a cook. He forced his way into the house and shot her in the breast and abdomen. Before the woman died she charged Lewis with the crime. He acknowledged it and said: "I meant to do it, too." The third, Packenham, murdered his wife March 13, 1888, at 212 West Twenty-seventh street, because she refused to giv him money to buy liquor. He cut her throat with a razor. He had frequently abused her, and had been sent to the Island several times. The fourth, James Nolan, killed Emma Buch with a pistol at 9 Second street on Nov. 20, 1888, because she refused to support him any longer on the wages of her shame.

Here are passages from the newspaper accounts of the jail life of the villains for a week or two previous to their hanging, up to the scene of the Ascension to paradise:

"Said Carolin: 'The priest and the sisters giv me comfort. Death is but a little step to the other life.'"

"Packenham has become very religious. It is difficult to get him into any other vein of thought."

"A little cell has been fitted up as chapel for them."

"Packenham's children are in a convent."

"Three Sisters of Mercy came to see them about 9 o'clock and spent two hours talking and praying for them."

"Since Packenham has been in the city prison he has become very religious, and he passes at least six hours a day in prayer."

"The men together heard the regular church services of the Catholic faith with priests and Sisters of Mercy; separately they had prayers with the devout black-garbed women."

"On the ground floor there are six cells in a row, one for each man and the remaining for an oratory. This is carpeted, and a small table is set at the further end, upon which stand tapers and a crucifix. Above hangs a holy picture. There the men spend most of their time in prayer."

"'I don't know what we should do with condemned men in the last days of their life if it were not for the ministrations of the clergy and the sisters,' said Mr. Sexton. The prospect of pardon and peace held constantly before their minds not only soothes them, but inspires a sort of ecstatic eagerness to enter upon the life to come which robs death of its terrors and makes them willing to go. It seems that in prison to men about to die religion is not 'a failure.'"

"Father Gelinos visited them. They are beginning to be very devout. They prayed for several minutes after arising."

"Fathers Prendergast and Gelinas arrived at 10 o'clock, and one or the other remained with their charges until they retired for the night. Even then the priests did not leave the prison, for they slept close at hand. Under their pious ministrations all the men grew calm and quiet, all appearance of nervousness leaving them."

"Nolan pays great attention to the priests, and is earnest in his devotional exercises."

"Carolin was made happy by the visit of Mrs. Miller, for she came with a message from her husband that they would see that his body received decent interment in consecrated ground. This promis of a consecrated grave seemed to giv the unfortunate man great satisfaction."

"Father Prendergast entered the prison with Father Gelinas, the regular Catholic chaplain, and these kind priests passed over an hour with their penitents. During the afternoon Father Gelinas again entered the death-watch chamber after a tour of the prison, as is his custom on Tuesdays, and he did not leave until after 3 o'clock. Two Sisters of Mercy arrived at 2 and remained with the prisoners until their suppers were brought in."

"Attending to his daily devotions or listening to the consolations of his religious advisers, Packenham shows by every act that he has reached a state of mind which will enable him to die peacefully."

"Bath, spiritual communion, prayers, breakfast, reading, smoking, exercise, prayers again, and conferences with the priests—such were the incidents in the earlier hours."

"That the thought of death is ever present in their minds may be inferred from the very great eagerness with which they perform their religious devotions."

"At 11 o'clock the good priests Fathers Prendergast and Gelinas made their first visitation of the day, and from that hour until late in the afternoon, except at intervals when they were receiving friends and listening to their good-byes, the murderers were almost constantly at prayer."

"Part of the time when Father Prendergast was at the prison he was accompanied by Father Van Rensselaer, a recent Catholic convert. Sister Mary Francis and her usual companion and two other Sisters of Mercy spent hours with the condemned men."

"The Sisters of Mercy, who had been in faithful attendance upon the murderers during the greater part of the day, left the prison for the night at 7 o'clock. The men thanked them most earnestly for their many kindnesses."

"Shortly after this the men returned to the cage and took supper and then Father Gelinas led them in a short prayer. Father Prendergast slept in one of Warden Osborne's rooms."

"Father Prendergast, on the morning of execution, will say mass in their cage, and just before their going to the scaffold will administer to them the Host."

"Upon the entrance of the sheriff and under-sheriff they went at once to the condemned cage. There the murderers were alternately engaged in prayer and listening to the exhortations of the priests."

"They declared that they died as penitents, and in the hope of divine forgivness."

"Fathers Prendergast and Gelinas were resting in rooms near them."

"Packenham had always protested since being sentenced that he would go bravely to the gallows, having made his peace with God."

"Father Gelinas went into the little chapel in the cell next to the last of the five where the murderers lived their last days. There were candles burning on a table there, and a crucifix was the one thing that the candle-light made conspicuous. Before it the murderer and the priest bowed to pray. Carolin, Lewis, and Nolan were called then in turn. As speedily as they could get them ready the deputies and Father Gelinas prepared the four doomed men for mass. Just at 5 o'clock the group of men heard the tramping of feet in the main corridor, and a moment later they saw Father Gelinas lead the procession of murderers and the deputies to mass. Father Prendergast had been in the chapel since 4:30, when he had said his mass alone. Father Van Rensselaer joined him later, and they received the procession. One of the jurors who had studied in a Jesuit college went up to serve at the mass. The service was short and solemn. It included the administration of the last communion."

"An impressiv scene was transpiring inside the walls of the structure—that of the procession to mass. Having attended to their toilets and bidden everybody near them goodbye, the four doomed men were escorted to the prison chapel, on the corner of Center and Leonard streets. Under-Sheriff Sexton led the sad procession, each of the prisoners being placed between two deputies. Warden Osborne and Deputy Warden Finley followed. Nolan was the first in line, Carolin, Packenham, and Lewis following in the order named. The scene in the simple little chapel was an impressiv one, for as the men so soon to die knelt at the altar the pallor of death was already on their faces, and great beads of sweat stood on the brows of Packenham and Nolan. Lewis eyed the altar and the priests curiously, he being a new convert. Docil and child-like he knelt with the rest, evidently conscious that prayer was good for his soul. Carolin had by this time recovered from the terrors of the night. More intelligent than the colored man, his face wore a devout expression, and he joined in the responses quite audibly. Around these wretched men were gathered the death watch, all kneeling, but vigilant in the discharge of their duty, even at that solemn moment, when the almighty was being beseeched to grant his pardon to those so soon to be ushered into his presence. The low voices of the faithfu priests rang clear and full through the half-empty chapel as the candles on the altar burnt dimly in the light of the clouded sun. As the service proceeded an expression of peace settled on Packenham's features, and Nolan's eyes grew dim as this old man prayed beside him. Mass having been performed, Father Prendergast administered the sacrament."

"The prison cook, a burly man, knew when the murderers were back in their cage, and immediately he served them their last breakfast of coffee, rolls, and eggs [not meat—it was Friday]."

"While they were in the kitchen the murderers were in their cage praying with the three priests."

"Father Prendergast went over to Packenham and began praying. 'My son, bear up under this trial,' said the priest. 'Hav no fears, father,' the murderer replied."

"Muttering the prayers recited by the priests, Nolan exerted his bodily strength in order to keep pace with those conducting him to the fatal tree."

"As he approached the scaffold, and as he stood on it, Packenham repeatedly said: 'Jesus hav mercy on me; Jesus hav mercy on me.' Again and again Father Prendergast answered: 'Pray, my son, pray. May Jesus hav mercy on your soul.'"

"Nolan's lips were moving constantly, and he, too, was exclaiming: 'Jesus hav mercy upon my soul,' and Father Gelinas was answering repeatedly: 'Pray. May Jesus hav mercy upon your soul.'"

Of the four men, three lied steadily all the while they were engaged in preparations for saving their souls in case their lying did not avail them. They asserted their innocence all the time they were in jail till the end approached, when two of the three, seeing it would be of no use to lie longer, acknowledged their murders. One, Carolin, continued to lie to his last breath. He died, like the others, submissiv to God, but maintained his hate of man to the last. He had to make peace with God to secure his harp and crown, but not being under such compulsion to treat his fellow-beings right, he was determined to vent on them his malignancy as long as he could, just as he had done all his life. On the scaffold the three priests were standing near him, when he suddenly thrust his head forward and growled: "I die an innocent man. I am innocent, too." Lewis turned his head around and said: "Oh, shut up; die like a man." "God damn it, I don't care," retorted Carolin. There was not the slightest shadow of doubt of his guilt.

What, it has been asked, would be the effect on crime in England if the condemned person could obtain his pardon by apologizing to the queen? Yet such is the Christian system.

This Christian system just fits the constitution of the classes who receive it, and this is why it flourishes so. Between every society and its creed there must be a certain fitness of each for the other. Rationalists look to the effects an ill deed has in making their fellows unhappy, and they know that when they hav done an ill deed there is no wiping out the score. So they hav to impose on themselvs a perpetual restraint. They hav to—there is no other way of their getting along with their conscience. But criminally inclined classes cannot hav anything to do with such a system as that. It requires restraint, and that they will not hav. What they must hav is a system that provides gratification of their viciousness, which will not submit to restraint. This want is met by the confessional box and the atonement. With this apparatus, they strike out a life aimed to be a perpetual round of pleasures. They get the best of us poor Freethinkers in every way. They hav everything their own way. They go on and insult, steal, assault, and kill just as they please, and thus hav everything their own way in this life; then when they cannot do that any longer they say they believe some rubbish or other and get into heaven, and hav everything their own way there; so they hav everything their own way every way. We poor Infidels cannot do this. We unfortunate fellows cannot believe what they say they believe, and so hav to drag along without having much of anything our own way anywhere.

These prison-life accounts occupy whole pages in the daily papers. The young roughs with whom cities swarm devour every line greedily. Attention is nowhere in the accounts called to the inexpiable effects on humanity of the crimes. The idea set up for attention everywhere is that of obtaining from the Lord admission into his paradise. The roughs read of the criminals fixing up things all right at the last moment; what little hesitation they might hav felt is removed by the reflection, "We will do likewise when it comes to that some day," and off they start insulting, quarreling, pilfering, waylaying, assaulting, and murdering.

More.

Still they come, in the endless procession of godly criminals. Here are three more.

The execution of Giblin, confined in the New York prison, approaches. He is just like the others—a good Catholic woman-murderer. He was to hav swung with them, but was granted a respit of sixty days. More religious ceremonies forthcoming.

A few days ago Christian Luca, a respected grocer of Brooklyn, was stabbed to death by a burglar in the night. The assailant cut at him a long time, when it had become unnecessary, exhibiting a delight in ferocity. Luca was a German, thus belonging to that nationality the farthest advanced in Freethought of any in the city—perhaps was a Freethinker himself. The murderer was, of course, an Irish Roman Catholic. He was a savage young beast. He had been married a week before by a priest. Soon we shall hav over again the old drama of priests, gallows, sacraments, and Ascension.

Reports come from the West of the execution of George Duncan Bryson, a Christian woman-murderer. He murdered his wife, Annie Bryson. The execution took place at Boulder on August 9th. The arrangements for being railroaded through to heaven were much as before. The Rev. Mr. Wickes was sent for. A Salvation Army service of prayer and song was held. Bryson entered into a long private conversation with a Salvation Army man, and then joined the procession to the gallows.

Looking back over these accounts, what shall we say of this bedlam of priests, drunkards, preachers, blood, prayers, scoundrels, sisters, wardens, murderers, rites, burglars, incantations, scaffolds, sacraments, halters, and Ascension?

Bruno.

The commotion created by the erection of the Bruno statue continues to be tremendous. It increases rather than abates. Leo XIII., it seems from all cable reports, was made ill by the statue, and now he has issued a papal allocution on the matter, and further is looking up Vatican archives to concoct some scandal against Bruno intended to be blasting. The lesser heads of the church in all countries hav issued imitations of his fulmination. Catholic societies everywhere hav assembled and protested against the sad wrong done them. It is reported, with what correctness we cannot say, that the pope has excommunicated King Humbert of Italy for his participation in the dedication of the monument. One of the latest protesting assemblages was held at Neustadt, Germany, at which Herr Lieber said that the Bruno festival was a dance round the golden calf, and referred to the martyr as an ass and a pig. We endeavor to present to our readers this week several productions pro and con on the matter. The Catholic Home pronounces the erection of the monument "as villainous a proceeding as the history of the world will ever be called upon to record." The Catholics of England (we quote from the Roman letter of the Catholic Mirror) hav written to the pope approving his protest against the erection of a monument to Giordano Bruno, and say:

"It grieves us that certain men hav had the insolent audacity to violate the reverence due to the supreme pontiff, and with him the whole Christian world, in erecting a monument to one Bruno in the very place where he suffered the punishment due to his crimes. His monstrous opinions put forth concerning human society, government, states, and the truth of philosophy exceed in perversity all others."

Let everyone take notice of this utterance. The Romanist policy inclines lately to hide its secret approval of persecution for opinion's sake, and although occasionally some incautious utterance reveals the depths of ferocity waiting fit time to be opened, it is rarely that we get an expression like this. It is astonishing that the church should so forget itself as to deliver this outspoken and unqualified indorsement of persecution. "The punishment due to his crimes!"

On other pages we present Charles Bradlaugh's reply to the papal allocution, his reply to the pastoral of the bishop of Salford, and, as a sample of the opposition, the pastoral of Archbishop Corrigan, of New York.

The last, the pastoral of Mike Corrigan, opens with a pitiful history of the downward movement of the papacy in Italy, commencing with the establishment by Garibaldi and his noble associate Freethinkers of the kingdom of Italy, and ending with the Bruno "outrage." Next we hav some assorted defamations of Bruno. Succeeding are several paragraphs of that class with which readers of Catholic literature are familiar. They treat of free will and Freethought. It is the custom of the church to mix with almost every communication to its flock some dissertation of this stripe on some profound problem of philosophy and metaphysics. The dissertation is always laid off under different heads by a classification giving it an appearance of great exactness of thought. But beyond this methodical device for producing an appearance of exactness, the rest is all the most welter-ing confusion. It is usually impossible even to make out what it is that is being talked about. The writer's brain is muddled, and of course the production is the same. The hearers do not understand it. But they believe the writer does, and are greatly impressed. The subject here is one that is capable of being treated with clearness, and anyone can meet intelligible thought on the matter by turning to the works of the philosophical writers of our side—Mill, Lewes, and Spencer. Perhaps those living remote from Catholics will not be averse to having presented them an example of the stuff fed to Romanist flocks. Next in the pastoral are more maledictions of Bruno and those who wickedly say with him, "I will not serve"—that is, will not chink gold in priests' purses. The close announces a continuance of the collection, of course, and "prayer for the intentions of the holy father." The holy father would better hold no intentions of procuring war to be made on Italy for its course toward him. If he tries any such game he may be made even more ill by the results than he has been by the statue to Giordano Bruno.

Laws Are Nothing to Them.

Two instances hav lately occurred in Ohio of disgraceful renunciation by government of its powers in favor of the Roman Catholics. In two instances the Catholics wished to hold assemblages on the Sabbath and to hav the saloons open during that time for their convenience. Flagrant as such an act is, the town councils remitted their Sunday-closing laws during the hours desired.

Louisville is the first place. A new Catholic cemetery was to be consecrated in the town, and delegations of Roman Catholics were expected from the surrounding towns. The village council, by a unanimous vote, granted the saloonkeepers the privilege of opening their back doors from four to seven o'clock in the afternoon, and selling intoxicants, in direct contravention of the Owen Sabbath law.

Cleveland is the second place. The German Roman Catholic Central Association met in that city and the authorities followed the example of the village of Louisville and allowed the Sunday-closing law to be openly and defiantly disregarded. The term hospitality was made the shield of law-breakers.

Passing over the consideration of what a comment this is on the drunken habits of the Romanists, we will notice only how it illustrates the domineering spirit of Catholics everywhere. They cannot be brought to conceive that there is a thing on earth that should not be made to yield to their religion and their wants. They hav not the slightest idea of how anyone or anything can justly refuse to coöperate with their transactions. They constitute the most astonishing embodiment of insolent, grasping greed the world has ever wondered at.

Cincinnati.

For some time, up to a few Sundays ago, the Sunday law in Cincinnati has been laxly observed. Recently the preachers got together and laid out plans for compelling the stricter observance of that law. They hav prosecuted these designs with vigor. On a recent Sunday a number of German citizens, filled with doctrins of personal liberty and even Anarchism, made an organized effort at resistance and kept open their places of business, mostly saloons. But they were reduced to subjection, and hav had to beg for mercy in the courts and promis humble obedience. The Sabbatarians hav conquered.

Now, this Sabbatarian revival in Cincinnati was got up, supported, and engineered by the ministers. And its nature is, not to secure liberty to sects to worship God on Sunday, but to compel everybody else to cease work too. It is not to secure liberty to some, for they hav that liberty now; but it is to take away the liberty of all the rest. The question we ask is, how in the face of all the actions like this is it possible for any human being in this country to go on oblivious of the fact that we hav a union of church and state? The clergy showed unblushingly their determination to enter fully into the use of political methods and parties and all the intrigues and dickerings imaginable, to secure the infamous end of religious oppression. They did it all openly, and boast of it. One of the pious committee writes to Rev. Irving W. Metcalf, Cleveland, Ohio, after this description:

"It would do you good to see the wondrous change in our city. And all this grand change has come about through the persistent hard work of a few men.

"Last winter our Evangelical Alliance, sick of the dreadful state of things, determined to see if something could not be done. We appointed a committee of ten to consider ways and methods of securing a change for the better. This committee met and at once doubled its number by adding ten good business men, thus linking us more closely to the business interests. . . .

"By this time we had about eighteen hundred names on our books. We then secured headquarters and went to work at ward organizations. We elected our police judge, the very man we wanted, the prosecuting attorney, comptroller, and superior judge. Out of the firm, faithful work of these officials by simply overriding the mayor, who is a whisky man, has come the present happy state of affairs. The good work has gone on to such an extent—for we hav made the Committee of Five Hundred a permanent organization—that public sentiment is thoroughly on our side, that the Republicans hav had to make their mayor come out openly in an official order enforcing the closing law. They did this not because they wanted to do it, but because the party's future made it absolutely necessary. It is our purpose to work on next winter until we get some obnoxious and hindering legislation out of the way, and the law amended to make it easy to carry it out. I am quite certain that our representativs will listen to our request hereafter. Indeed, it is quite certain that they will not even be elected without our approval. We are grateful to God for what he has done."

Editorial Notes.

We regret to announce the death of Mittie, the faithful wife of Jeremiah Hacker, Berlin, N. J.

Wyoming and New Mexico are the places in which Secularists must now make a fight for American constitutions. The constitutional convention of Wyoming opened on the 2d; that of New Mexico, on the 3d. In the former Protestants will endeavor to pervert the true principles of civil government; in the latter, Catholics.

We hav incautiously mailed to bookbuyers our last copy of that useful work exposing the crimes of convents, "Sister Lucy and Her Awful Disclosures." We need a copy to use in getting out a new edition, and if one of our readers will send us one, we shall be grateful. The foregoing we printed two weeks ago, but we hav not received a copy. We hope our subscribers' ardor for Freethought literature will not lead them into the hardheartedness of keeping it away from all the Christians we hav yet to civilize.

In the trial of the supposed murderers of Dr. Cronin at Chicago, the counsel for the defense is arranging to hav a jury of none but Catholics. On the 31st ult., Judge Wing, of the counsel for defense, struck one man who seemed to be all that could be desired, but who in the course of examination said he belonged to the Presbyterian church. The lawyers for the defense all leaned over and whispered to get rid of him. Judge Wing tried for half an hour to pick some flaw in the gentleman's opinions, as he wished to husband his peremptory challenges, but without success, and he finally challenged him peremptorily on behalf of Coughlin.

Four more men hav been killed as a result of the Howard-Turner feud in Harlan county, in the mountains of southeastern Kentucky. Our daily papers hav sent special reporters down into these lawless regions, who giv full particulars of the life and manners of the nativs. Without an exception these bloody-handed prosecutors of family feuds are Christian believers of the most undoubting sort. Freethought is unheard of, and it may safely be conjectured that a Freethought lecturer attempting his propaganda there would instantly be mobbed or lynched. Now, will some one say what is the conclusion to be drawn from all these facts?

A clergyman at Hungerford, England, declared recently that freer forgivness may be expected for stealing a £5 note than for entering a dissenting place of worship. This is a specially marked example of that influence of Christianity inimical to morality—the substitution for the true moral standard of the artificial one of orthodox conformity in theological belief.

In the coming church congress in England, the subject of "Infidelity" is down for discussion. Of course no Infidel will be present. Note the difference between the Christian method and ours. We invite representativs of the Christian and every other opposed belief to take part in our debates. Everyone knows that the only way to reach the truth in any matter whatever is to hear all sides. As what we want, and all we want, is the truth, this is what we do. When bodies do otherwise, as in this instance, there is only one inference to be drawn—they do not want the truth.

Letters from Friends.

JASPER, ALA., Sept. 1, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Several weeks ago I wrote an article for a labor paper. It was an open letter to a minister who gave notice of speaking on the labor question. The following questions were suppressed by the editor:

Do you believe it right for man to make laws to giv money a reproducing power or force? As money by nature is a non-producer (cannot reproduce itself), why should it be given a false and unjust power or force?

Hav all men the same natural rights in this world? Because some men are inferior in capacity, does this fact giv the superior the right to take away the weaker ones' rights, and make them their slaves or servants?

The editor complimented on this suppressed paragraph, and then neglected to publish it. We want scientific truth on all subjects, and the privilege to use the same. "The truth shall make you free." DR. J. K. DEARTH.

HEBER, UTAH, Aug. 20, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Your paper has been a welcome guest for twelve years in our family, and I do not know how we could do without it now. Long may you liv to carry on the good work you hav engaged in. I also wish Brother Heston long life and success in his grand and noble work. It adds wonderfully to the paper. In many cases you can show a picture to a whole crowd at once, and it nearly always strikes some one forcibly enough to cause him to say, That is just about right;" and others may think so but do not hav the manhood to say so, but perhaps may in time. I did not become a Freethinker in a day. I said years before I ever thought of dropping my creed, viz., Mormonism, that when I was done with it I would be an unbeliever in all religions, so I was in proper condition, and when THE TRUTH SEEKER accidently fell into my hands it seemed as though I had found something congenial to my taste. JAMES LINDSAY.

MINNESOTA LAKE, MINN., Aug. 27, 289.

MR. EDITOR: I am in hope to see Mrs. Freeman again, as was stated in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hear her speak. Welcome here! She gave us a lecture last spring at Minnesota Lake, and the money paid is not enough for the good which she has done here. Many Christians thought, That is the best religion that ever was preached in the nineteenth century; that is reason, truth. That little woman, as they call her, handles her subject in a way showing her naturally gifted. Friends, we want her work in the Northwest, where priestcraft is very strong yet. And by service of a lady lecturer we will draw in more women to hear the great reform.

Two weeks ago we had a Catholic fair at Easton, Minn., where young ladies, I expect by order of the priest, sold some tickets for the benefit of the church. I was not able to send for a lecturer to hav a lecture a day before the fair, and I was just wishing, and watching in THE TRUTH SEEKER, and lo! nobody came this way at that time. E. S. GLICK.

NEW YORK, Aug. 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: If, instead of throwing away so many millions in churches, which in reality are of no benefit to humanity, the same amount were spent in buildings to serve a double purpose, viz., the lower departments as public schools, and the upper ones as houses of abode, would it not be better? The amount of rent monthly collected would not only pay competent teachers, who could liv with their families in one of the stories of the same house, but a very good sum would be over monthly to help the poor of the district where the school is located. Even if such a building should occupy a whole block, it would be of the greatest benefit to humanity; but of course its importance would be in relation to the locality and number of scholars receiving a sound, moral education.

With this reform carried out, I believe in a few years hence there would not be a single man or woman who would not be an educated person, and the schools, under such basis, besides teaching gratis would be a boon to the poor. What is your opinion of this subject? A REFORM SEEKER.

POCAHONTAS, Aug. 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I beg indulgence once more to speak through the grandest truth seeking organ of all I hav ever read, which are not a few.

In the first place, I suppose Mr. Hart deserves notice, and as he was courteous in questions I will try and be so in answers. His first question as to whether I was sure I had reached the target, I think was answered in the article he referred to—that is, by the contrast between Materialism and Spiritualism. If spirits are visible, tangible, and bodily, then our standard lexicographers hav erred, our language is at fault, and none of us know whereof we speak.

As for Mr. Hart's second question, Was I dishonest when preaching, and how long did I sing, Spirits are hovering around? I will answer: I believe we are all more or less dishonest, deceitful. It takes time for anyone after he becomes deluded to find out his delusion. And again it takes time after he finds out he is deluded to sum up courage to face opposition, bigotry, Christian persecution, and hypocrisy, and command fidelity to principle in order to be outspoken, and denounce what he once honestly advocated.

I was extremely delighted in your last issue with two articles, one from old Brother J. Hacker and the other from W. E. Walton. I would like to know if Mr. Hacker still has on hand his old-time publications for sale.

Ex-REV. JOSEPH N. MAXEY.

UNION, ORE., Aug. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I get to thinking sometimes, and I feel sorry to think there is so much ignorance in the world. I am sorry to think that I ever was in that condition. The first I began to get my eyes open was after I got to this country. There came a medium along and gave three lectures, and that broke the ice and I began to think, and I am trying to think ever since. And I often wish I could talk like the good Colonel Ingersoll. I read all there is in THE TRUTH SEEKER for and against Spiritualism, and I can't see that either one is hurting the other. Now, my opinion is this: the Catholic and Protestant go together to get some certain ends accomplished, and I say let Spiritualists and Infidels stay together and work for humanity—for the good of the man and not for the soul. Let the soul take care of itself. If the man is all right all will be well. If man works to his highest idea of right, he does well. No man can do better. I am sorry to hav to think there is so little goodness in the professed Bible believer or professor as to believe the Bible and not ever do even one of the words of God. I cannot think they are any better than an Infidel that does not pretend to believe. The pretended Christian I think is the most revengeful being there is. Believe or be damned, is the idea. I am afraid if some of them get to heaven they will tear the golden streets up to get the gold to store away. Still the sky-pilots shun our little park. We havn't had a sermon for six months. We are "goners."

"The Woman of the Club" I think ought to be read by everybody, rich and poor. W. M. SOUTH.

CHICAGO, ILL., July 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Will you please be so generous as to do a little free advertising for the love of God, or rather as devotional homage to many gods, virgin mothers (the first I ever saw), hoodoos, and minor other little deities too numerous to mention of all kinds, sizes, shapes, styles, ages, genders, complexion, etc., etc., now on exhibition and for sale at 114 Wabash avenue (or thereabout), and at other places in this great and holy city of Chicago?

Some hav a countenance like the rising sun, others hav smiles of jealous rage, with tear-besniveled, woebegone expressions, while others look like "de old gray goose a-smiling at de gander." Gods suited to everybody, anybody, and nobody, as you pay your money and take your choice. Each god is guaranteed to be the only true and original one.

I cannot giv the price and terms, but as money and adoration is scarce, and gods rather going out of style, I think they can be bought cheap and at monthly instalments. Little gods in swaddling clothes at half price. O ye worshipers of deities, now is your time, for ye know not when the hour draweth nigh. Selah. Don't fail to secure one at once before the good ones are gone.

To those who may wish one of the other kind, I think they can hav one made to order, as they hav some extra tails, cloven feet, glass eyes, etc., and they can easily import any expression of countenance they like. A. D. SWAN.

ROCHESTER, N. H., Sep. 27, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: "Truth seeker" means much to me. We are told that long, long ago Pilate asked, "What is the truth?" Humanity are groping, reaching, hungering, and thirsting for truth. They beg for bread and get a stone. Sad, sad. And the question is asked, Why spend ye your money for that which is not bread? why labor for that which profiteth nothing? We fail in our judgment. We try to be satisfied with shadows, with echoes, like children. We stop crying and are delighted with the doll, the toy, or any trifle until we learn it is filled with sawdust; until we learn that our teacher or preacher knows no more than the little toddler about what he preaches so glibly. We know it is vanity of vanities and vexation of spirit. While this condition of things cannot reach us individually, our hearts ache for the many who suffer because of weakness of soul or body.

I hav met many who held with the most tenacious grip delusions so bare that it was a wonder they did not see their folly and throw their idols, their false gods, the wretched substitutes, away, glad to be rid of them. But, no, sir. Instead, they would declare, "Beautiful thou art, O Bel, and in thee there is no deceit at all."

If we would only see and understand the object of living; if we could comprehend and enjoy the beauty, the brightness, the love, overflowing from the heart of our dear Mother Nature! Instead, "we go long and weary ways, wandering through the yesterdays." We wait until our loved ones cross the dark river, then scatter flowers over the pulseless dust. We are expected when we become men and women to put away childish things. Do we do it? With the light of to-day, with the help of progress, with inventors, genius, etc., we certainly should prove that we are living and growing; that we are not petrifactions of some very remote period to be used only as a warning, and rarely wanted even for that. I will stop. It has just occurred to me that probably all your readers know all about these subjects and it would be superfluous for me to chat longer. You hav my best wishes for your success; and you cannot help prospering, for you are right. "Ever the right comes uppermost," etc.

I will take my flowers now, if you please.
  Don't wait until I am dead.
I shall not be able to thank you
  When they rest on my coffin lid.
Let me hold them in their beauty,
  See the colors bright and gay,
Enjoy their fragrant odor,
  While it is yet to-day.
To-morrow never comes, love.
  There is no time but now.
Let us do our best to cheer the day
  And seeds of kindness sow.
Regret, remorse, is useless;
  We must braver be
If we expect in the autumn
  A harvest full to see.

MRS. ELIZA CADIEUX.

LEXINGTON, KY., Aug. 31, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: What constitution of society is this, where the principle of organic expansion which should conduct our national affairs to a culminating point of utility is wanting, and a screw loose somewhere? The heavy weight is upon us of mummy forms of worship, fearful nightmares of superstition, which cause men to constitute society with a blind reference to the will of a deity, who is unable to control the forces he has launched into space. What we call religion is merely a power which commenced with fear, and was continued with self-interest. What a fearful interregnum through which we are passing—a Christian country, corrupted by criminals in monetary affairs, with vices and crimes raging like epidemics, mischievous cabinet officers appointed instead of being elected, churches raving about doctrins and Sabbath observances instead of those things which really make for righteousness!

A thousand Charlemagnes are piously seducing the people, especially the young, from the paths of justice and peace. Society can be reconstructed only with a view to improvement, upon a basis of reasonable opinion and moral rectitude. How necessary, then, is a freedom from erroneous doctrins which involve dangerous principles, giving power to pious malefactors in office to wreck and destroy our republic! Churches cannot be trusted with power and influence, for they appear to lack candor, consistency, and a high sense of honor. Their peculiar poison is inserted everywhere, and the mind of the masses is rent by conflicting opinions. The Jew denies that the fear of brimstone has any power as a cause to secure salvation, or that faith and joy in the Holy Ghost hav any connection with a moral and useful life. The Campbellite preaches hell without one reference to the future state. "A leap into the dark," is with them a household expression. They deny the office of the Holy Spirit, obedience or baptism being the pastework or outside door which admits heavenly graces, the whitewash which givs you a good standing in the church. The Jew has much to say of individual influence as a savior of the world. It seems that Philo, a Jew of Alexandria, preferred one God to an oligarchy of such existences. In modern times Luther was proud of fastening upon the world the fangs of the doctrin of "justification by faith." Next appears Cardinal Gibbons upon the scene, who would not leaven the world with dangerous Bibles. He thinks priests are the spice of society. Rome rejoices in a plentiful supply of this condiment, numbering two thousand of these useless beings.

Science is satisfied with examining phenomena, but religionists are always prating of cosmical unity, forgetting that this can be predicated alone of the nervous system which can know and understand what is going on in the universe.

Unmanly devices to keep down the spirit of investigation spring from greedy and sensual minds. God is their father, or the pope.

An artificial construction of society will not prosper. Let statesmen study nature. Carlyle observes that "nature is all."

"By long continued oppressiv infringement of the natural rights of large masses of men, it is that the way is prepared for revolts and insurrections." During the reign of Richard II. occurred a bloody struggle for justice and natural rights. The people were forced to redress their wrongs. The insurrection, conducted by Wat Tyler, fierce and criminal as it was, is pronounced by thoughtful men to be the cornerstone of English independence. ALHAZA.

BYRON, ILL., Aug. 29, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Once upon a time there was a great plague in Egypt. And the plague overcame all the land of Egypt, simply because of the faults of one man. This is not in accordance with the story that Christ suffered death for the sins of the world. Now, gentle reader, go back with me to the year of 1491 before Christ, according to Bible history, and see what we find. I refer you to Ex. viii, 6: "And Aaron stretched out his hand over the waters of Egypt: and the frogs came up, and covered the land of Egypt." But I would advise you to read the book of Exodus from the seventh to the tenth chapter; then wipe off your chin, pull down your vest, and think it over, and see how ridiculous it sounds.

It seems quite evident that Moses took a pill and slept well ever after telling this yarn.

If T. De Witt Talmage should go down to the banks of the Hudson river, get down on his marrow-bones, and pray God to cast a curse on the people along that stream alone, do you think it would be done? No, it would not be done. Neither do I believe the story as recorded, and credited to Moses as the author.

Moses has left us in the dark in regard to the water that continually flowed in Egypt from the south from the source of the Nile river. Moses says in Ex. vii, 19, that the river turned to blood for seven days. This water did not stand still, it is certain. So he must hav continued to curse it. There are but very few rivers with a current less than four miles per hour, and at that rate the water would flow ninety-six miles per day, and at the end of seven days would hav traveled about six hundred and seventy miles. But I suppose he had it stop, like the Jordan, when the children of Israel crossed over.

I suppose Moses or Aaron stuck a stick in the South Fork dam, which was the cause of the Johnstown, Pa., disaster. It looks about as sensible as that.

Also, just gaze on Ex. viii, 17: "And they did so: for Aaron stretched out his hand with his rod, and smote the dust of the earth, and it became lice in man and beast; all the dust of the land became lice throughout all the land of Egypt." Now, how does that sound to your ear, Mr. gospel-shop man? But I suppose you will say amen to it, as you believe every word of it whether it is so or not. But God in his wisdom and wiseness was generous to Pharaoh, as he sent a swarm of flies to devour the lice.

Ex. viii, 24: "And the Lord did so: and there came a grievous swarm of flies into the house of Pharaoh, and into his servants' houses, and into all the land of Egypt: the land was corrupted by reason of the swarms of flies."

Dear reader, whoever you may be, do you honestly believe any such stuff as this? Does it seem reasonable that a God who has all power and control over the will and mind of man would resort to any such low-lived deals as I hav quoted? I cannot see the object in resorting to any such low, degraded punishment as this, when you hav full control over man. If Pharaoh did not do as God wished, why did God not say so (I understand he is a man and talks like a man), and not beat around the bush about it like some low-lived coward?

When I read Ex. vii, 10: "And Moses and Aaron went in unto Pharaoh, and they did so as the Lord had commanded: and Aaron cast down his rod before Pharaoh, and it became a serpent," it makes me think that Moses and Aaron were addicted to strong drink, as it looks as if those two men of God both had snakes in their boots—that their brain was out of order from an overdose of bugjuice of some sort. Snakes came in this world through nature, not a stick cast on the ground. It is no wonder that there are so many that cannot believe the "Inspired Book of Tales."

C. Force Mitchell.

Leavenworth, Kan., Sept. 1, 289.

Mr. Editor: Did you ever notice that it is not the preaching but the singing that does the work at revivals—that "beats the bough and brings down the fruit?" Uniting voices in song is a social act, and it is the social part of Christianity, nowadays, that propagates the faith and makes it of any practical benefit to its votaries. Christianity is becoming more social and less doctrinal. Social work and social duties are taking the place of theology. The self-styled "children of light" are getting wiser than we "children of darkness." They can giv us pointers, every time.

It is too bad that Liberals are so slow in taking up social work. They read, discuss, debate, compare, analyze, philosophize, theorize. They scale the walls of doubt, and climb the hights of abstract truth. And what? They garner the juiceless chaff of dry speculation and throw away the golden grain of earthly social enjoyment.

A bird in hand is worth two in the bush. Heavenly mansions and abstract truth be hanged. This is a concrete existence, in a concrete world. Let's quit arguing and hair-splitting and go to fiddling and dancing.

I hav a friend, a "stanch Liberal." He borrows my Truth Seekers. He is sound. His wife and daughter are Christians. He goes with them to church. Of course he can argue them blind. And so they compromise. He gets the argument—they get the turkey. Mentally he is a Liberal—socially he is a Christian. So it goes. Liberalism gets the argument—the church gets the turkey.

When we took up our abode in this city we were searched out by numerous church folks, given warm greeting, and invited to their churches and social feasts. I chose rather to hunt for Liberals. I found three or four, but their social cups were full, their social wants were all supplied. They were not in need of any new acquaintances just then. And so saying—in effect—they retired into their shells and pulled the latchstring in after them. What matter if strangers are without the door perishing of cold and hunger—our hearth is snug and warm! Do they ask for bread? Giv them a stone and send them away!

Well, time passed, and no calls. Wife cried and said, "Let us join a church." "You do so, I will tough it out," said I. "No, I will stay and starve with you," said she. "Our social cravings will die out," said I; "nature will kindly adapt us to our environments—will ossify, encrust, dwarf, and we too will become clams."

Does Liberalism mean a release from all social courtesies and responsibilities, a discharge from all social obligations and duties? Does it mean social paralysis, social death? Certainly not. But alas! it too often leans in that direction. Let our lecturers, editors, writers, and Liberals generally giv more heed to social work. It is the imperativ need, the crying want, of Liberalism. Let us not allow the church to monopolize all the brotherhood, all the good-fellowship, and all the "friendship, faith, and fraternity," there is in the world, for these grand and beautiful principles belong as much to us as to them. Let us, too, spread a feast and go out into the by-ways and hedges.

Not one in fifty, not one in a million, particularly among women, can subsist alone upon granit truth. Truth makes good landmarks, milestones, pavements, monuments, etc., but for "wittles" to eat, giv us a lighter diet.

I once asked a Liberal friend which he would rather possess, love or truth. "Truth," replied he, "for truth is an eternal principle; love is only a passion." "You are wrong," said I, "for truth is not a human need and love is. I would not giv the love of mother or sweetheart, to say nothing of all the lesser loves, for all the truth the universe contains."

Being in Kansas City (twenty-six miles distant) once on business, I spent half an hour hunting up a Liberal whose name I had seen in the Liberal papers, and a profound thinker. I found him in his shop, and introduced myself as a Liberal, but he forgot to lay down his tools, giv me his hand, or invite me to a seat. I talked with him a few minutes, told him how delighted we would be to receive a visit from him and his wife and show them our beautiful city, but got no return of the compliment, and withdrew. I never did think much of icebergs. However, if these lines chance to meet the eye of some socially inclined Liberal in Kansas City who feels like exchanging the social courtesies of life with a Leavenworth Agnostic, let him drop me a line. A fair exchange is no robbery.

East Des Moines, Ia., Aug. 18, 1889.

Mr. Editor: This holy pope of Rome's Sabbath, as the bells from the numerous church spires summon the Sunday Christians to their weekly offerings to appease an angry God, I seize my pencil to make another plea for Freethought and the perpetuation of those liberties for which our forefathers pledged "their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor." As the sound of those bells dies away, my mind is carried back to the sad ending of a fond mother's life, who perished for want of the necessaries of life within the sound of these same bells. She was the mother of a large family of small children, her husband a coal miner reduced to half time in consequence of mild weather the past winter, and herself an invalid for many long weary months. Their only income was the father's wages, and could he hav worked full time, there were barely sufficient to pay rent and keep the wolf from the door when all were well. But with reduced time and an invalid mother, the hungry wolf gained admission, and his insatiate gnawings at the vitals of that afflicted mother closed the last scene in her drama of life. She perished in the midst of plenty, surrounded by people who claim to be followers of Christ, that being whose mission on earth, the Bible teaches us, was to do good to his fellow-man. A benevolent woman—not a church-member—of limited means, but with a heart open to the cries of suffering, heard of this family's condition, and on visiting them found the woman bedfast, soon to become a mother again, and without food that she could eat, and not bedclothes enough to keep her warm, notwithstanding the mild winter, which could scarcely be called winter in Iowa. Samaritan-like she neglected her own work, and with the help of a few kind-hearted people she succeeded in obtaining supplies of food and clothing sufficient to afford temporary relief. But it came too late to save the poor mother, whose death may justly be charged to the selfishness of her Christian neighbors. "Ah," says one, "if she had been a member of our church, she would hav been provided for." So indeed would the members of all these orthodox and Catholic churches say, were they interviewed on this subject. Shame to them! Are they not all the professed followers of the same meek and lowly Jesus? Do they not all take the same Bible as their rule of faith and practice? And yet because, forsooth, she was not a member of "my church," the ties of common humanity were severed, and the poor woman perished within sight of nearly a score of church spires, whose hight indicates to the subjects of Freethought the altitude to which the hypocritical prayers made beneath ascend. The writer can well remember when Christians as a rule tried to adorn their profession; a time when men preached the gospel from a sense of duty regardless of salary; a time when religion would crop out through the week instead of being held as an invincible reserve for the pope's holy Sabbath; a time when the Christian's ear was open to the cry of suffering humanity whether it came from saint or sinner; a time when church-membership did not involve a weekly appearance clad in silks, satins, broadcloth, and false jewelry as a welcome admission to the velvet-cushioned pew in a palace of bigotry and religious intolerance; a time when men were measured by their moral and intellectual worth instead of the mighty dollar, whose successful accumulation shows a slavish devotion to the swinish propensity, "Keep all you get, and get all you can."

But alas, how are we changed! To-day a man may hav the wisdom of Solomon, the meekness of Moses, the patience of Job, and the virtue of Joseph, and yet if he has not money he is but as sounding brass and a tinkling cymbal. The most successful minister of this age is he who spices his eloquence with the flavor of divine approbation of the efforts of his millionaire parishioners in a legal robbery of the laboring poor by assuring them a through ticket on a reclining-chair car and Pullman sleeper to the celestial regions, although the poor mechanic who built these traveling palaces at starvation wages may hav to deadhead his way to the infernal pit for want of funds to purchase immunity from the sin committed by his primogenitor Adam in the mythical garden of Eden. The death-knell of religious liberty in this country will be sounded when fanatics get their vindictiv, revengeful, never-changing God incorporated in the Constitution, and a rigid observance of Sunday enforced by the strong arm of the law backed by severe penalties.

Wheeling, W. Va., Aug. 28, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I see in last issue of The Truth Seeker that C. E. Boynton, B.S., M.D., of Onondago Hill, N. Y., has an article that I wish to notice. As he is an M.D., no doubt he classes himself among the intellectual. The doctor seems to know something of the ravings, sayings, and doings of the inmates of insane asylums. He goes on to say that at a Spiritual camp-meeting he has "met with the same kind of psychological phenomena that the asylums contain, always wearing that far-away look in the eyes, and possessed of the feeling that they partly liv in other worlds than ours," etc. The doctor was telling about the insane ravings of some enthusiastic Christians who landed in the asylum, then branching off as in the above, leads the reader to infer that Spiritualism lands its devotees in the asylums also. Now, doctor, will you please inform me of a single "full-fledged," intelligent Spiritualist that you know to be in an asylum on account of Spiritualism? Please tell me who it is, and former place of residence. Please giv the readers of The Truth Seeker the benefit of your lore on that point.

Again: I will agree to giv you $2 for every outspoken Spiritualist—known to be such—that has committed suicide, if you will giv me $1 for every Materialist that I can name who has done so. Come, now, let us hear from you. Two to one is offered. The remark the doctor made about Spiritualists wearing a "far-away look about the eyes," and seeming to "feel as though they lived in other worlds than ours," is too silly to pay even a passing notice. I am only sorry that an M.D., and a so-called Liberal, should stoop to try to make it appear that there is any difference between Spiritualists and others in that respect. Perhaps the doctor sees the far-away look of the eyes when he looks in a glass; hence his keen perception in regard to others. Now, doctor, if you can gain any sweet consolation by writing such nonsensical flummery as the above, just strike at us again. There will be no broken bones for you to set.

The doctor claimed the Spiritualists he met at Lake Pleasant, Mass., were quite as intelligent as those Christians he met in the asylum. That is one of the doctor's sly thrusts at the intelligence of Spiritualists. Well, if we do not know much, it is quite bad enough without any of the doctor's sly hints. Now, doctor, I venture to say it would not hav taken any of those Spiritualists at Lake Pleasant nearly as long to tell what they know as it would take you to tell what you do not know. I hav traveled around some in my nativ country, been almost to the far corner twice; and hav gone through the spelling-book; and hav concluded that Crookes, Varley, Wallace, Zöllner, the czar of Russia, Queen Victoria, the ex-president of France, all of Europe; and A. J. Davis, Denton, Judge Edmons, B. F. Wade, Giddings, Robert Dale Owen, Helen Wilmans, Professor Hare, Abraham Lincoln, Henry Wilson, Henry Kiddle, Juliet H. Severance, M.D., Louis Waisbrooker, D. M. Bennett, and millions of others, will stand at par with any other class of people on the globe. Now, I am going to tell you something, doctor, that I hope you will remember and heed ever after. You say: "I will be glad when some brilliant minds that hav espoused Freethought will cast from themselvs that wish-begotten belief in immortality that supports the fallacy of Spiritualism;" "throw aside the baseless illusion of immortality," etc. Will you please tell me how you know Spiritualism to be a fallacy? Tell me like an honorable M.D. how you know it. No guessing allowed, doctor. You must know Spiritualism to be a fallacy, or you would not hav called it such. If you know a thing, you can certainly tell how you know it. Hav you disproved it? I wish to hear from you on this point. Some day when it rains, and you hav no patients to visit, please tell us. Do not forget it. What I wish you to be sure to heed is this. Do not try to keep us Spiritualists in the same boat with yourself, for we are not there. We are sailing in a scientific boat. You are in the old boat of belief. You and our Christian friends might hitch teams and pull together on that point. They believe we shall liv beyond the grave; you believe the grave ends all. They believe, you believe. It is belief, belief, and nothing but belief, with you and them. Are you not in the same boat? Christianity is not a science. It cannot demonstrate any of its claims. Materialism is not a science. It cannot demonstrate that the grave ends all. In order to demonstrate it some one who had died would hav to come back and tell you he did not exist; that the grave ends all. You would hardly expect such a demonstration, would you, doctor? Materialists boast of their ability and desire to deal in facts. You say, "Giv us solid facts." Did you ever stop to think that you cannot demonstrate or produce one single fact as to the grave ending all—not one fact. Science is simply demonstrated facts. Spiritualism is a science. It is capable of demonstrating itself.

I hope, doctor, that you are honest enough and gentleman enough to forever cease calling Spiritualism a belief. It is not a belief. We know that our friends and relativs who once lived in the grosser bodies, as we are now, still liv beyond the grave. I hav seen, heard, and felt them. I hav two clairvoyant children who hav accurately described and given the names of those who had passed to the higher spheres many years before they were born. How could they describe them if they did not see them? Life beyond the grave cannot be reasoned in or out. There is no way of knowing it but by positiv demonstration. This I hav had to my entire satisfaction, and beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Your not knowing it has nothing to do with the fact. It occurs to me that if Materialists would spend as much time and energy in an honest, sincere investigation of the subject as they do in writing slurs and sneers, hinting at our intelligence and doubting our sanity, and making assertions about that on which they are profoundly ignorant, they might ere long know something about a continued existence. They might learn that the grave does not end all. I hav witnessed about all phases of manifestations, from the tiny rap up to the materialization of the forms of friends and relations whom I fully and clearly recognized. I hav spirit pictures, of sisters and others, which I distinctly recognize. I hav written several sealed letters to those having passed on, and got satisfactory answers and tests, until it is as much of a fact to me that I can write to those who are dead—as it is called—and get answers from them, as that I can write to a friend living in the grosser body and get a reply. Now, doctor, you will no doubt laugh, and say, "Poor, credulous dupe!" Before you laugh and sneer, please tell me what you know about it. The parrot can say, "Pretty poll," but what does it know? I ask you, doctor, in all candor and good nature, to refrain from your sneers and jeers, and from making assertions you can in nowise prove, and pitch in for a fair, honest investigation, and never stop until you find it to be either true or false. And my word for it, you will find the grandest truth you ever found. You will find the Spiritual philosophy will open up new avenues of thought. It will lead the mind out into broad fields of pastures green, such as you never dreamed of in cold Materialism. Try it. And please remember, never again call Spiritualism a belief. You cannot believe a thing you know. Knowledge rises above belief.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Nursery Song.

Pace, pace, pace,
That's the way the ladies ride,
Foot hung down the pony's side,
Pace, pace, pace.
Pacing gently into town
To buy a bonnet and a gown;
Pacing up the narrow street,
Smiling at the folks they meet,
That's the way the ladies ride,
Foot hung down the pony's side,
Pace, pace, pace.

Trot, trot, trot,
That's the way the gentlemen ride,
O'er the horse's back astride,
Trot, trot, trot.
Riding after fox and hound,
Leaping o'er the meadow's bound,
Trotting through the woods in spring,
Where the little wild birds sing—
That's the way the gentlemen ride,
O'er the horse's back astride—
Trot, trot, trot.

Rock, rock, rock,
That's the way the sailors ride,
Rock and reel from side to side—
Rock, rock, rock.
Jack Tar thinks he's on the seas,
Tossing in a northern breeze;
Thinks that he must veer and tack,
When he mounts a horse's back;
Rocking east and rocking west,
Jack Tar rides, dressed in his best—
Rock, rock, rock.

Sleep, sleep, sleep,
That's the way boy Ned will ride,
Floating on the slumber tide—
Sleep, sleep, sleep.
Out upon the drowsy sea,
Where the sweet dream blossoms be,
Far away to Sleepy isles
Sails boy Ned. "Good night," he smiles;
Sinking down in pillows deep,
Little Ned is fast asleep—
Sleep, sleep, sleep.

In Armor.

If temptation be resisted,
And weakness be defied;
If I hold to right and honor,
Though my soul be sorely tried;
If I keep me true from falsehood,
If I hold me free from shame,
If my best strength be enlisted
On the side of honest fame—
Shall I praise me for my choosing?
Shall I think myself am strong?
Shall I laud me for refusing
All the sweets that go with wrong?
Not mine own the strength I'm using;
This the thought that safely mailed me,
This that held when courage failed me:
"There are those that love and trust me,
And I cannot giv them pain!"

A Sunday Out.

It was one lovely Sunday morning in August. The skies were blue, and floated on their serene seas a multitude of feathery cumuli in many changing shapes. Many churches were closed in the city, and pastor and people were enjoying their vacations in different ways and places. Bertha suggested that we go somewhere for the day, and thought a trip to the old town of Warren, R. I., not impracticable. A newspaper man was to accompany us, but he failed at the last moment to put in an appearance, and we started off together. A lot of people were at Bowenville station bound to Nantasket, to Boston, and way stations, and, although excursions were run that day, all was orderly and quiet, and nobody seemed to think the worse of the day because it was Sunday.

Our train came up at last, and away we went, slowly across the long bridge, over into Swansea, to Brayton, to Cole's station, a miniature hamlet of farmhouses here and there, crossed and intersected by Lee's and Cole's rivers, running along through meadows green and flower-decked fields.

We soon arrived at our destination, and stepped upon the platform in the midst of the pleasant buzz of conversation and the tread of many busy feet. We hurried toward the town, that seemed to be asleep late on this Sunday morning.

"People do lie in bed longer Sundays than on any other day," I said to Bertha. "It is a day of rest."

"There's one sluggard coming from his couch," laughed Bertha, and pointing to a nightcapped man's head peeping between the curtain and the window of a house near by.

We sauntered on up the street, and, meeting a group of boys, we inquired if there was anything pretty or curious to see in the town.

"There's the new public library," said one. "Hav you seen that? It was presented by a lady—Mrs. George Hall—and cost $20,000."

"Is it open to-day?" we inquired eagerly.

"What! Sunday! Naw. Guess you don't liv 'round here. To-day's Sunday."

We expressed regret that the building was not open, for we thought that we might pass a pleasant hour or two within its walls.

The boy said that, besides the hotels, we would find only two places open to strangers—the meetin'-house and the graveyard.

We decided to visit the resting-place of the dead. We went on a little way past a Catholic church, pausing a minute to listen to the chanting of the choir, and to watch the "devout worshipers" who were quickly filling the "sanctuary," stopping in the vestibule, each one to dip his finger in a large bowl of water, which was supposed to hav been rendered "holy" by some words and passes spoken and made by a priest. One who passed in with a very much soiled neck and ears, suggested by his appearance that a closer acquaintance with soap and honest spring-water would render him more agreeable if less "holy," as the interpretation goes. We thought we would place cleanliness before holiness.

We were soon in the old burial-place, and it was almost as much as our lives were worth to make our way through the tangled grasses and briars that threatened at every step to trip our feet, and, as well, we were obliged to fight with all our might a million, more or less, of the fiercest musketoes ever met by friend or foe. They bled us at every step, but with a fan in one hand, with the other we traced on a crumbling stone the name of "Major Robt. Carr, who departed this life on the 15th day of Aug., 1789, aged 48 yrs." Following the date was the epitaph:

How loved, how valued once, avails thee not,
To whom related, or by whom begot,
A heap of dust alone remains of thee—
'Tis all thou art, and all the proud shall be.

We thought this a sensible card. The major's wife, Lydia, died Feb. 19, 1796, aged fifty-one years. The inscription upon her tablet of slate read as follows:

Lydia, thy graceful person here doth lay,
Yielding to death-worms, dust, and nativ clay;
Discharged from these we humbly hope thy soul,
Inspired with love, may sing without control,
Above the skies whilst endless ages roll.

"To sing for endless ages without control. It makes me tired to think of it," said Bertha.

We walked on to read that Miss Patience Barton died Sept. 30, 1788, at the age of seventy-nine. Upon the tablet of this spinster were inscribed these words:

Rest here, dear friend, till from the skies
The last loud trump shall bid thee rise.

"She will get very tired, I know," remarked Bertha. "'The last loud trump!' Humph! I should jump, I think, at the first faint sound."

A stone laid flat attracted our attention. It was inscribed thus:

Erected in memory of Mrs. Betsey Gardner, beloved wife of Capt. Edward Gardner, who departed this life May 20th, 1803, aged 29 years.

Kind stranger, stop, let reason be the clue
To moralize while this cold stone you view;
Here Death, in icy arms, confines that fair
Who once was lovely as the angels are.

William Turner died in 1858, ninety years old. This is his epitaph:

Hail, glorious gospel!
Heavenly light, whereby
We liv with comfort,
And with comfort die.

Bertha began to quote the gospel about the unbelievers being cast into "the lake of fire and brimstone, where there is weeping, wailing, and gnashing of teeth."

"That's your 'glorious gospel,' Mr. Turner; but if you could liv and die comfortably with it, I think you were more, or rather less, than human."

Another stone informed us that Miss Seraphine Randall

Bid adieu
To all her earthly friends,
March 7, 1838,
And left her lifeless form here to sleep
Until the resurrection.

We said: "Sleep on, sister; you hav plenty of time for a good long snooze."

We walked on, still fighting musketoes, and stopped to read that Mr. Sylvester Marble departed this life July 7, 1826, aged twenty-eight. This inscription adorned his resting-place:

Though greedy worms destroy my frame,
And gnaw my wasting flesh,
When God shall build my bones again
He'll clothe them all afresh.
Then shall I see thy lovely face,
With strong immortal eyes,
And feast upon thy unknown grace
With pleasure and surprise.

"Good Lord," ejaculated Bertha, "I'll take cremation, if you please, rather than be 'gnawed' by 'greedy worms.' And," she continued, "I would like something more strengthening than 'unknown grace' for a feast. My appetite would crave something more substantial, I think."

In this old spot reposes the dust of a member of the old Boston Tea party, a friend of education, and, we should judge, a man of strong, good sense and nativ wit.

After dinner at the Fessenden Hotel, we visited the outside of the library, an elegant building, the gift of a noble woman, who should hav stipulated to hav it open all days alike. We then wandered on to a more modern burial-place. Here the carvings upon the stones represented, instead of impossible cherubs with wings projecting from the neck, or the skull and crossbones of a more superstitious age, beautiful flowers, anchors emblematical of hope, though here and there might be seen a representation of an urn shadowed by a weeping willow, which is not so bad in its significance.

One piece of marble told to passers-by that "Alexis Menage was a nativ of Lucerne, Basse Normandie. For the last 25 years a nativ of the United States. He died in Barrington March 24, 1845, æt. 48. He was a kind father, an affectionate husband, and a humble Christian." He addressed his children thus:

My children dear, this place draw near,
A father's grave to see;
Not long ago I was with you,
And soon you'll be with me.

Mary Ann Fales died in 1844, at the age of 23. She says from her grave tablet:

Go home, my friends, and dry your tears,
I shall arise when Christ appears.

Bertha thought it a weary waiting, and failed to find the consolation to friends in the couplet.

The two words on a stone near by were much more significant—"Gone before."

In another lot a tablet bearing simply the words "Doady," and its companion with the letters, "Billy Boy," cut deeply in the marble, told a plaintiv story of childhood and all its hopes destroyed in an instant. We felt how hard it must hav been when the childish prattle and its merry laughter were hushed in the house, and pathetic silence came in their stead.

"There's not an hour by day or dreaming night but I am with thee," was touchingly inscribed upon another tablet. And the sweet words—"Our darling," "We miss thee," "At rest," and similar sentences, together with the freshly cut flowers upon the graves, spoke volumes of grief, love, and tender memories. Modern thought, progressiv ideas, were visible all about. Loving hands and hearts sought to invest the saddest of all sad events with something of hope and cheer. Thus progress is everywhere, and stars of peace, hope, and love shine out and illume the midnight gloom of death.

It was nearly train-time and we took a short cut across the fields and cow pastures for the depot, where we chatted pleasantly with friends till the train came up. Mr. E. told us that Warren was his childhood's home, here he went to school, disobeyed the teacher, and, for some trifling offense—he thought it trifling—was sent from school in disgrace. We thought it very true that the grown-up men of to-day were about the same as children as the boys we know. Human nature does not change a great deal.

Poetry.

The Disputation.

The following amusing delineation of one of the logical combats that occasionally occurred in medieval times between Jewish rabbis and Christian friars, is by Heine, one of the most distinguished of German poets. Heine was a Freethinker. Owing to the extreme length of the poem, parts hav been omitted.

In the Aula at Toledo
Loudly are the trumpets blowing;
To the spiritual tourney,
Gaily dressed, the crowd are going.

This is no mere worldly combat,
Not one arm of steel here glances;
Sharply pointed and scholastic
Words are here the only lances.

Gallant paladins here fight not,
Ladies' honest fame defending;
Capuchins and Jewish rabbins
Are the knights who're here contending.

Which God is the one true God?
He, the Hebrew stern and glorious
Unity, whom Rabbi Judah,
Of Navarre, would see victorious?

Or the triune God whom Christians
Hold in love and veneration,
As whose champion Friar Jose,
The Franciscan, takes his station?

By the weight of mighty reason,
And the logic taught at college,
And quotations from the authors,
Whose repute we must acknowledge.

Either champion ad absurdum
His opponent would bring duly,
And the pure divinity
Of his own God point out truly.

'Tis laid down that he whose foeman
Manages his cause to smother,
Shall be bound to take upon him
The religion of the other,

And the Jew be duly christened—
This was the express provision;
On the other hand the Christian
Bear the right of circumcision.

The following is a portion of the advocacy of the Christian disputant:

He recounts how in the godhead
Persons three are comprehended,
Who, whenever they so will it,
Into one are straightway blended.

'Tis a mystery unfolded
But to those who, in due season,
Hav escaped from out the prison
And the chains of human reason.

The work concludes with the following ecstatic prediction of the joys of heaven:

We in heaven shall be hereafter
Into angels blessed converted,
Wandering there in bliss with lily
Blossoms in our hands inserted.

In the place of cowls, the purest
Robes shall we, when there, be wearing,
Made of silk, brocades, and muslin,
Golden lace and ribbons flaring.

No more bald pates! Round our heads there
Will be floating golden tresses;
While our hair some charming virgin
Into pretty topknots dresses.

Wine cups will be there presented
Of circumference so spacious,
That, compared with them, the goblets
Made on earth were not capacious.

On the other hand, much smaller
Than the mouths of earthly ladies
Will the mouths be of each woman
Who in heaven our solace made is.

Drinking, kissing, laughing will we
Pass through endless ages proudly,
Singing joyous hallelujahs,
Kyrie Eleison loudly.

The following is the peroration of the Jew's rejoinder:

Great leviathan the fish is
Who beneath the ocean strayeth;
And with him the Lord almighty
For an hour each morning playeth.

With the exception of the ninth day
Of the month Ab, that sad morrow
When they burnt his holy temple;
On that day's too great his sorrow.

Just one hundred miles in length is
The leviathan; each fin is
Big as Og the king of Basan,
And his tail no cedar thin is.

Yet his flesh resembles turtle,
And its flavor is perfection,
And the Lord will ask to dinner
On the day of resurrection

All his own elect, the righteous,
Those whose faith was firm and stable,
And this fish, the Lord's own favorit,
Will be set upon the table.

Partly dressed with garlic white sauce,
Partly stewed in wine and toasted,
Dressed with raisins and with spices,
Much resembling matelots roasted.

Little slices of horse radish
Will the white sauce much embellish;
So make ready, Friar Jose,
To devour the fish with relish.

And the raisin sauce I spoke of
Makes a most delicious jelly,
And will be full well adapted,
Friar Jose, to thy belly.

What God cooks is quite perfection—
Mark my honest council follow,
And be circumcised, your portion
Of leviathan to swallow.

After some attempts at proselytism on each side, which degenerate into wrangling, the issue is thus brought about:

Then the monk with equal passion
Answered thus the furious rabbi:
"Villain, may the Lord destroy thee,
Damnable, accursed, and shabby.

"I can well defy your devils
Whom the evil one created,
Lucifer and Beelzebub,
Astaroth and Belial hated.

"I can well defy your spirits,
And your hellish tricks unhallowed,
For in me is Jesus Christ, since
I his body blessed hav swallowed.

"Christ my only favorit food is,
Than leviathan more savory,
With its boasted garlic white sauce,
Cooked by Satan, full of knavery.

"Ah, instead of thus disputing,
I would full soon roast and bake you
With your comrades on the warmest
Funeral pile, the devil take you."

Thus for God and faith the tourney
Goes on in confusion utter;
But in vain the doughty champions
Screech and rail, and storm and splutter.

For twelve hours the fight has lasted,
Neither side givs signs of tiring,
But the public fast grow weary,
And the ladies are perspiring.

And the court, too, grows impatient,
Ladies make with yawns suggestions;
To the lovely queen the monarch
Turns, and asks the following questions:

"Tell me, what is your opinion?
Which is right, and which the liar?
Will you giv your verdict rather
For the rabbi or the friar?"

Donna Bianca gazes on him,
Thoughtfully her hands she presses
With closed fingers on her forehead,
And the monarch thus addresses:

"Which is right, I cannot tell you,
But I hav a shrewd suspicion
That the rabbi and the monk are Both in stinking bad condition."

Taxing Church Property.

From the New York Commercial Advertiser.

Whether we like it or not, the drift of political sentiment is everywhere in the direction of taxing church property the same as any other.

This was expressed Wednesday in the constitutional convention in Washington territory by the adoption of a clause forbidding the release of any kind of property from its proportionate share of the public burdens. The object of this was the taxation of churches, private schools, and charitable institutions.

California has had a similar provision for several years in its constitution. Though at first opposed by a large minority, it has grown in popularity until it is now accepted as a matter of course even by the most thoroughgoing churchmen. Some of them express the belief that the poorer churches should be exempt, but this simply corresponds to the opinion held by many political thinkers (among them ex-Secretary McCulloch) that all small property holdings should be exempt. So far as the costly city churches are concerned, the sentiment favoring their taxation is almost unanimous.

In the Eastern states the sentiment against exemption is also growing, though in a less marked degree. It is in the main confined to political students, and to the more strenuous supporters of the public school system who oppose the education of a part of the children in parochial schools. Not until all church property is taxed, they maintain, can we make sure that all our children shall hav a common education in the principles of American citizenship and be united in sentiment and sympathies.

Curiously enough, England has taken an important step in the same direction. Only a short time since a considerable sum was bequeathed to a foreign missionary society, and the executors under the will claim that it should be exempt from the tax upon bequests. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge decided that the probable excellence of the charity in no way lessened the claims of the state. The amount of the tax on the bequest was the state's money and not the testator's. To remit it was to increase by just so much the burden upon the remaining taxpayers. Such an increase of the public burdens could not take place, except by the direction of the public itself. No exemption could therefore be permitted.

In the same way it might be maintained that in this country, where all private property is held subject to a lien for annual taxes on the part of the state, the value of this lien is in fact public property. To remit the tax when the property is transferred to a religious institution, is therefore to increase the amount of the charity out of the pockets of the remaining taxpayers. Such, at least, is the philosophy of the refusal of California and Washington territory to exempt the property of religious and charitable institutions. It is the logical carrying out of two American principles: First, the complete separation of church and state; second, equality before the laws for property as well as men.

A Theologic Unknown.

From the Louisville Commercial.

LEBANON, KY., Aug. 16th.—For some time past the columns of one of the local papers hav been loaded with ponderous syllogisms that hav been hurled to and fro with more or less effect between the Rev. Mr. Cherry, a Methodist preacher from the knobs of Loretto, and an anonymous writer who has wielded an acrid pen over the pseudonym of "Victor." The subject of the controversy was "Religion in the Public Schools." The Rev. Mr. Cherry took the position that the public schools should be entirely godless, and that no tenets of Christianity should be embraced in their curriculum. "Victor" took the opposit line of argument, and contended that the creed that predominated in any locality should be the recognized religion of the whole district. "Victor's" articles were exceedingly well written, and were generally attributed to the Rev. Father Defraine, the Roman Catholic pastor.

The columns of the county paper soon became too narrow for the more or less broad views of the two gentlemen, and the Rev. Mr. Cherry challenged the unknown "Victor" to a public debate. The latter accepted the challenge, with the condition that his identity should not be discovered until the day appointed for the contest. To-day was selected for the meeting, and Edmunds's Hall, at this place, was crowded beyond its standing capacity by the champions of each cause.

Promptly at 10 o'clock the Rev. Mr. Cherry appeared on the stand and threw his gage into the arena, at the same time challenging the anonymous "Victor" to come forward and pick it up. There was a commotion in the rear of the hall, and to the surprise of the nativs and the consternation of the Rev. Mr. Cherry, there appeared, not a priest, all shaven and shorn, but as black a negro as ever came out of Ethiopia. He proved to be Sam Rountree, an itinerant preacher and fiddler, who officiates at all the hops and "buryin's" in the four counties.

Rountree is a man of some education, and claimed the authorship of the "Victor" articles. There was no one to dispute his claim, and he demanded that the Rev. Mr. Cherry stand up and defend himself. This the reverend gentleman declined to do, and amid the wildest excitement he was borne from the hall by his friends, while the old negro departed, followed by the huzzas of the crowd. The community is convulsed with laughter, while the zealots of the Methodist and Catholic creeds are filled with excitement.

Church Statistics.

From an Exchange.

David was punished for numbering the children of Israel, but the New York Independent will receive only the thanks of the public for numbering the Christian families in the United States, or, rather, massing together such statistics as they furnish concerning their own growth. In bulk the number of communicants with us is about 20,750,000, and the increase for one short year has been 877,000. The Methodists, of whom there are fourteen varieties, count up to 4,723,881. The Roman Catholics are estimated at 4,438,-019. The Baptists, of whom there are thirteen kinds, are footed up as having 4,078,589 communicants. The Presbyterians, of whom there are nine varieties, reach 1,180,113. The Lutherans number 988,008, the Congregationalists 475,608, the Episcopalians 459,642. The rest of the denominations do not foot up so large in numbers, and when they are arranged strictly by denominational rank the Roman Catholics hav a larger number of communicants by far than any other religious body. These figures do not tell the whole story, nor are they entirely satisfactory. The Roman Catholic statistics count the communicants as co-extensiv with the population, which is not fair to the Protestant bodies, who estimate their communicants by a different method. Again, the Unitarians are quoted as 20,000 and the Universalists at 38,780, while their actual following must be much more numerous. Again, when the division of members is made according to polity, there are 9,433,-196 under the Episcopal polity, 4,928,619 under the Congregational, and 2,888,228 under the Presbyterian. This givs the ecclesiastical color of the religious life of the country very differently from what it is commonly supposed to be. Those who speculate upon a basis of church unity will note that the Episcopal polity takes the lead; but when the total Protestant population is compare d with the total Roman Catholic population, it will be seen that the Protestant exceeds the Roman element by two to one. The figures given by the Independent depend upon so many conditions for their validity that it is almost impossible to draw any general conclusions from them. With all the religious bodies the total net gain for the last year is named as larger than it was for the year 1887, though it appears from the detailed account of gains as if it were less. The explanations given by the Independent are more helpful than the figures. The Roman church has grown enormously by immigration. The number of small bodies, branching off from the Baptists and Methodists, is remarkable, and the Presbyterians are only less broken up. The Quakers, though numbering hardly 107,000 communicants, are divided into three sects. The Mennonites hav 100,000 members, and are divided into four sects. The tendency to split up among Protestants is seen to be excessiv. In nearly every purely Protestant body lines are drawn between the old and the new schools, or the right and left wings. The Reformed Episcopalians are the smallest religious body; the Moravians come next, and then follow the Unitarians and the Universalists. The growing religious people in the United States are evidently the Roman Catholics, the Baptists, the Methodists, and the Episcopalians; the rest seem to be barely holding their own.

High Officials Embarrassed.

From the Philadelphia Inquirer.

There is a story of a presidential excursion down to the eastern shore of Maryland. The party embraced Secretaries Blaine and Windom and others. They went to church and were fortunate enough to hear an excellent sermon from the venerable Protestant Episcopal bishop of Maryland, who was there to administer the rite of confirmation. It was a rare pleasure to listen to a discourse from a clergyman who did not improve the occasion by referring to those high in authority or by preaching or praying at them. The president and the two secretaries, one on either side of him, sat in quiet satisfaction. But their peace of mind was suddenly and rudely dispelled. The offertory was sung. At the familiar words:

Let your light so shine before men, etc.,

the president and the secretaries each quietly dropped a hand into a pocket.

Lay not up for yourselvs treasures on earth.

Windom drew forth a crisp one-dollar note and held it between thumb and forefinger, ready for the approaching plate. The president and Mr. Blaine went a little deeper into their pockets. One brought up a nickel and the other a dime. Their faces flushed. It would never do to make such a small contribution.

He that soweth a little shall reap little, and he that soweth plenteously shall reap plenteously. . . . God loveth a cheerful giver.

The president went to his pocketbook and the secretary of state explored his vest pocket with nervous fingers.

Zaccheus stood forth and said unto the Lord: Behold, Lord, the half of my goods I giv to the poor, and if I hav done wrong to any man I restore fourfold.

The plate was only four pews away. What the president found in his pocketbook was one fifty-dollar note and a ten-dollar greenback—nothing smaller. What Mr. Blaine found was two ten-dollar notes—nothing smaller. To put in a nickel or a dime only was not to be thought of. To giv ten dollars was more than either cared to do; besides, how ostentatious it would look! Each looked at Windom, sitting there calmly, the richest of the party, with his dollar note in his hand. He shook his head.

Charge them who are rich in this world, that they be ready to giv and glad to distribute.

There was no time for further pocket exploration or consideration. With a smile of commiseration at each other, and something like ghoulish glee on Windom's placid countenance, the president and secretary of state each planked down his ten-dollar note for "the poor of this congregation." And the worst of it is, said one of the party afterward, that the Lord would probably giv them credit only for the dollar or two which they intended to giv.

JAEL DECEIVETH SISERA.

And Jael went out to meet Sisera, and said unto him, Turn in, my lord, turn in to me; fear not: and when he had turned in unto her into the tent, she covered him with a mantle.—Judges iv, 18.

Gems of Thought.

ALL sects hav given to their gods ferocious characters, at which reason revolts.—D'Holbach.

IF the Bible is true, slavery is right, and the world should go back to the barbarism of the lash and chain. If the Bible is true, polygamy is the highest form of virtue. If the Bible is true, nature has a master, and the miraculous is independent of and superior to cause and effect. If the Bible is true, most of the children of men are destined to suffer eternal pain. If the Bible is true, the science known as astronomy is a collection of mistakes, the telescope is a false witness, and light is a luminous liar. If the Bible is true, the science known as geology is false, and every fossil is a petrified perjurer. —Ingersoll.

WHEN we see that institutions impracticable in one age hav flourished in a subsequent one; and that what were once salutary laws and customs hav become repugnant; we may shrewdly suspect that the like changes will take place in future. The incongruity with the state of men and things which at present givs to certain proposed principles an appearance of impracticability, may, in a coming age, no longer exist; and those principles that now seem so well adapted to our social condition may then no longer harmonize with it.—Spencer.

LAWS and institutions must go hand in hand with the progress of the human mind.—Thomas Jefferson.

THE more we examin this great principle of skepticism, the more distinctly shall we see the great part it has played in the progress of European civilization.—Buckle.

THE most progressiv countries are those where the principle of free inquiry has modified Christianity. Skeptical Germany is in the forefront of progress, and as England, France, and America escape from the trammels of ecclesiasticism, just so fast do their institutions improve.—Robert C. Adams in Pioneer Pith.

EARLY history is never critical and painstaking in the investigation of facts. Neither the historian nor his readers or hearers hav reached a stage of culture in which accuracy is highly valued. Early history is essentially artistic, its object is much more to charm the fancy and warm the emotions than to instruct the understanding. A good story, pathetic or humorous, is appreciated for its own sake independently of its truth. Striking pictures, dramatic situations, often told in dialog, scenes in which virtue and vice are depicted on a colossal scale—these are the chief objects of the early historical writer, who mingles fact and fiction with the same naïvete as his brethren, the writers of the early epos and drama. Indeed, their subjects are often the same—the heroes whose prowess saved or achieved the national existence, the odious foreign foe who was beaten back; in either case characters appealing strongly to the imagination and the feelings, which would resent cold criticism, but gladly welcome eloquence and passion. History written under these circumstances has much of the character of the prose poem—carmen solutum, as Quintilian called it. The artistic or imaginativ element predominates in it rather to excess. The growth of accurate knowledge in other departments, the increased practice of affairs, the substitution of the political for the heroic and chivalrous sentiment, lead to a more sober and scrutinizing style of history without sacrifice of artistic form.—Encyclopedia Britannica.

IN those blessed days, that which actually occurred was not regarded of sufficient importance to be recorded.—Ingersoll.

IT is, indeed, marvelous that science should ever hav revived amid the fearful obstacles theologians cast in her way. Together with a system of biblical interpretation so stringent, and at the same time so capricious, that it infallibly came into collision with every discovery that was not in accordance with the unaided judgments of the senses, and therefore with the familiar expressions of the Jewish writers, everything was done to cultivate a habit of thought the direct opposit of the habits of science. The constant exaltation of blind faith, the countless miracles, the childish legends, all produced a condition of besotted ignorance, of groveling and trembling credulity, that can scarcely be paralleled except among the most degraded barbarians. Innovation of every kind was regarded as a crime; superior knowledge excited only terror and suspicion. If it was shown in speculation, it was called heresy. If it was shown in the study of nature, it was called magic. The dignity of the popedom was unable to save Gerbert from the reputation of a magician, and the magnificent labors of Roger Bacon were repaid by fourteen years of imprisonment, and many others of less severe but unremitting persecution. Added to all this, the overwhelming importance attached to theology diverted to it all those intellects which in another condition of society would hav been employed in the investigations of science.—Lecky.

Odds and Ends.

"DEAR MR. EDITOR: Please read the inclosed poem carefully, and return it to me with your candid criticism as soon as possible, as I hav other irons in the fire." "Dear Mr. Smith: Remove the irons and insert the poem."

THE Rev. Mr. Wilgus: "I hope you and Brother Wiggs became fully reconciled before he died." Deacon Podworthy: "Oh, yes! I went around and told him that as he was about to pass in his checks I would fully forgiv him for all the dirty tricks he had ever done me, though I didn't presume to say that the Lord would do so, and [gleefully] you ought to hav seen how the old sinner looked."—Terre Haute Express.

AFTER the earthquake at Saratoga. First old darky: "Come, let's go ober to de pra'r-meetin'." Second old darky: "No, no, brudder; I stays in de free air ob hebben. Don't b'lieve in goin' into dese yer buildin's dat mite fall down on yer." First old darky: "Wot! And don't yer trust no more in de Lord?" Second old darky: "Yes, brudder, I does trust in de Lord, but I don't b'lieve in foolin' wid him."

AMONG the children of a certain Sunday-school is a bright little boy of four years. He has an uncle who takes great pleasure in teaching him nonsensical verses. A few Sundays since his teacher was telling the class about the busy bees, and asked if any of the children could tell her anything about them. "Waldo can," spoke up the little fellow. "Well, Waldo, you may stand in front and tell us what you know." And Waldo, rising proudly, steamed away with these lines:

How doth the little busy bee
Delight to bark and bite,
To gather honey all the day
And eat it up at night!

LAST year, at the New York Chautauqua, when Dr. Henson, of Chicago, came to lecture on "Fools," Bishop Vincent introduced him thus: "Ladies and gentlemen, we are to hav a lecture on 'Fools' by one of the most distinguished"—there was a long pause, for the bishop's inflections indicated that he had finished, and the audience roared with delight, so that it was some time before the sentence was finished—"men of Chicago." Dr. Henson, whose readiness of wit holds every emergency captiv, began his lecture, when silence was at length restored, by saying: "Ladies and gentlemen, I am not as great a fool as Bishop Vincent"—and here he stopped, apparently through with the sentence, while the audience again wildly applauded, finally concluding—"would hav you think."—Minneapolis Tribune.

AN amusing incident occurred in one of our Downeast churches a few months ago. The clergyman gave out the hymn:

I love to steal a while away
From every cumbering care,
And spend the hour of setting day
In humble, grateful prayer.

The regular chorister being absent, the duty devolved upon good old Deacon M., who commenced, "I love to steal," and then broke down. Raising his voice a little higher, he then sang, "I love to steal." As before, he concluded he had got the wrong pitch; and deploring that he had not his "pitch-tuner," he determined to succeed if he died in the attempt. By this time all the old ladies were tittering behind their fans, while the faces of the "young ones" were all in a broad grin. At length, after a desperate cough, he made a final demonstration, and roared out, "I love to steal." The effort was too much. Everyone but the eccentric person was laughing. He arose, and with the utmost coolness said: "Seeing our brother's propensities, let us pray." It is needless to say that but few of the congregation heard the prayer.—Yankee Blade.

AND now the season of the Summer Boarder being upon the land, it shall come to pass that the young man of Country Raisin' (which the same is likewise known as a Yokel, and moreover as a Hayseed), shall stand in the field where he toileth, and shall perceive at a little distance the young man of City Dressin'; and he shall jeer at him and cast obloquy upon him; he shall scoff at that young man, and shall scorn him, and shall size him up for a Derned Dude, and shall rejoice in his own strength, and shall cry, "Ha, ha!" and likewise, "Ho, ho!" and similarly, "He, he!" But, furthermore, it cometh to pass that on the first day of the week, which is Sunday, the young man of Country Raisin' shall hie him to the sanctuary in time to escape the sermon, and there he shall behold his Best Girl escorted forth by the young man of City Dressin'; and, moreover and furthermore, the young man of City Dressin' shall everlastingly catch on to that maiden in such style as is calculated to gratify the taste of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, and she shall display all outward appearance of liking it. And thereupon the young man of Country Raisin' shall gnash his teeth and withdraw himself into outer darkness, and betake himself behind the barn to giv voice to the emotions of his Soul. Selah!—Puck.

Guru-initiated, know that
I'm a bold Blavatskyite.

Manvantara and Pralaya,
Parabrahm, Mulaprakriti,
Dhyani Chohans, and Purusha
Now are clear as mud to me.

Of the whenceness of the whatnot
I hav found the Perfect Way;
Wandering with the wild Mahatmas
O'er the hills of Himalay.

My Prana, Linga-Sharira
And Rupa soon will flee;
I hold on by my Manas
To my Atma and Buddhi.

With the blessed occult masters,
I'm a chela Kabbalist;
My ego thus reincarnated,
I'm a deep Theosophist.

POPE LEO'S receipts from Peter's pence amount to 7,000,000 lire or $1,400,000 a year, in addition to various amounts from other sources.

THE city of New York has 600 Sunday-schools, with a total of 187,000 scholars and teachers. Philadelphia has 616 Sunday-schools, with a total of 195,802 scholars and teachers.

MRS. BESANT, the eminent English Freethinker, is well-nigh idolized by the poor of East London, by whom she is familiarly called "Amere," and she is able to do a great deal of practical work for them in consequence of their affection for her.

THE Peace Society, recently in session at Mystic, Conn., determined to erect a great Peace temple. If the society can do this without a war over the funds, the site, the architecture, and other features of the enterprise, it will prove itself worthy of its name. — World.

IT was a clergyman in the editorial chair who wrote: "Looking backward over the checkered page of human history and beholding the wreck of nations and the roar of armies, we may trace the footprints of an almighty hand, bringing order out of confusion, and causing the white dove of peace to brood over the apples of discord."

THE annual account of Catholic missions has just been issued from the propaganda press. The number of Catholics in Ireland, according to this work, is 3,792,457; the churches number 2,547, and the priests 3,251; in England the Catholic population numbers 1,353,465; the priests 2,340, and the churches 1,261. In Scotland there are 308,643 Catholics, 295 churches, and 329 priests.

A CLERGYMAN, who was an ornament to the pulpit in an exceedingly esthetic regiment of the Lord's army, was delivering a series of discourses upon the history of Jonah. At the opening of one of the discourses, he said: "You will remember that in our last discussion, we spoke of the fact that Jonah was three days and three nights in—in the—whale's—society."—National Baptist.

AT Springfield, O., on the 1st, members of the church of Christ here were astounded beyond measure by S. B. Duffy, a prominent church-member, who arose in his seat at a declaration made by the pastor, the Rev. B. C. Black, and exclaimed: "You are a liar and a slanderer!" He went out of the church then. The trouble originated over J. S. Resler, who was superintendent of the Sabbath-school. Mr. Black said he had a bad reputation, and was not to be trusted with a flock of innocent lambs. Mr. Duffy defended Resler.

IN Lawrence county, S. C., on the 25th ult. Ben Leonard, colored, murdered his wife by cutting her throat. No cause for the crime could be found. Leonard would say nothing about the matter, but at the inquest Mr. Harvey Woods, the owner of the plantation on which they lived, gave his evidence, and brought out the reason for the murder. The morning before the murder Ben had threatened to kill his wife, and she had applied to Woods for protection. "I asked her what was the matter with them. She said Ben wanted to join the church, and she told him they could not liv in adultery and belong to the church; she being married twice, and both husbands living. Leonard murdered his wife so that he could join the church."

AT Worcester, Mass., on the 9th, the jury in the case of Dr. Louis Morasse, a practicing physician of Southbridge, against the Rev. Father G. Ely Brochu, priest of the Notre Dame church, brought in a verdict in the superior civil court this morning, giving damages for plaintiff of $1,500 with interest, or a total of $1,720. Dr. Morasse was a parishioner of Father Brochu. He was divorced from his first wife and was married a second time by a justice of the peace. For this he was denounced from the pulpit by Father Brochu, and this caused Dr. Morasse to bring suit against the priest.

ON the 31st ult. trouble broke out among the members of Holy Trinity church, Chicago. The church has been divided over the deed of the building being made to the archbishop. When Father Kobrzynski began to speak some of the worshipers began to stamp the floor with their feet; others threw their rituals over their heads. In the midst of all this the pastor began to say mass. When in the midst of mass, however, the worshipers left their seats and scrambled pell-mell over the sides of the inclosed pews. Father Kobrznski, fearing mob violence, rushed from the altar and out through the parsonage way. He was secreted for several hours by personal friends, who feared the excited people would use him roughly if they laid hands on him.

THE Rev. J. G. Gregory, incumbent of Emmanuel church, Brighton, Eng., has got into trouble with his boss, the bishop of Chichester, because the clergyman presided at a lecture delivered by the Rev. Justin D. Fulton, of Brooklyn, the violent anti-Catholic agitator, wherein the lecturer reflected upon the personal character of the Virgin Mary. The bishop informs Mr. Gregory in a letter that has been made public that he should hav protested on the spot. He continues: "I hope you will take some opportunity of publicly repudiating the lecturer's revolting statements which must giv much offense to all pious believers. It is amazing that they should hav been received on one occasion with laughter and on another with applause by an audience professing and calling themselvs Christians."

"ROBERT E. LEE was a strict observer of the Sabbath when not engaged in his campaigns," said Gen. L. L. Lomax, late commander of rebel cavalry. "I remember well one occasion when Fitzhugh Lee and myself, when cadets, were in Washington. It was a Sunday morning, and as the day promised to be a dull one, we drove over to Arlington to spend the time with Custis Lee. We found the family at morning prayers, and we joined in the services. When they were concluded, General Lee, with a grim smile, walked into his library, selected a religious book for each of his children, Custis included, and set them all to reading. The jolly time that 'Fitz' and myself expected to hav with Custis was indefinitly postponed. We excused ourselvs as soon as common decency would permit, returned to Washington, and resolved that when we visited Arlington again it would not be on a Sunday." We will add the conjecture that Lee probably desired his children should be given opportunity to get familiar with the good old pro-slavery texts.

On the War Path.—Concluded.

Nor can the Christians of to-day conceive how it is possible for an Infidel to be a true and just man, or that he is entitled to any degree of respect. They cannot understand that you hav the right to spend Sunday as you please, they can only understand that you ought to spend it as a Christian. They cannot understand how there can be any honesty outside of their religion; hence the word of an Infidel is not to be taken even under oath.

They cannot see the injustice of making Infidels pay taxes on their Christian clubhouses, because "the earth is the Lord's and the fulness thereof," and they are God's appointed agents to manage his affairs on earth. They cannot see that an Infidel has a right to bring up his children according to his idea of the fitness of things, they can only see that children ought to be brought up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. They cannot see that Infidels hav any right to say whether the Bible shall be used in the common schools, they can only see that a godless school is an abomination in the sight of God.

Thus it will be seen how Christianity tallies with the idea of human rights. Any day "Blare," Comstock, Talmage, and other Christian lunatics may by operating secretly through the churches and other Christian associations spring the ecclesiastical net over us, and we may again see the fires of persecution kindled in this so-called free America.

And all the time Christians would believe that they were rendering the most acceptable service to their God.

It would seem that two thousand years is about all the time the church ought to ask to produce good men and women, if Christianity could ever do it. But the truth is, the more Christianity has got hold of the minds of men the more devilish they hav proved to be.

Can anyone doubt that those who burnt and hanged witches were deeply imbued with Christianity? Were not those who murdered the Huguenots eminently Christian? Is it not a fact that Christianity and brutality hav always worked equally in the same yoke? Has not Christianity tried to make every act a crime which opposed it? Did not Christians exclude those from holding office who did not belong to the church, and even deprive them of the right to the electiv franchise when they had the power? Tyranny, persecution, and plunder hav characterized the Christian religion up to the present time. Human bones lie scattered along its track, and wherever it has set its murderous foot blood has gushed out.

After the discovery of America nearly every Christian nation was fitting out expeditions for the discovery of new countries. Two objects seemed to underlie every movement, viz., plunder and the conversion of idolators. Cortez, Diaz, DaGamma, Pizarro, and every man who was sent out on these voyages, was charged to take possession of the lands which they might discover, in the name of God and the king. And every expedition was furnished with a priest and a crucifix and charged to convert the idolators.

The answer of the inca to the priest who accompanied Pizarro's expedition is a little significant.

The priest, crucifix in hand, went to the inca and began a regular Christian harang. He spoke of the great God who created the universe, of the fall of man, the coming of Christ, his death and resurrection, of the appointment of St. Peter as his vicar on earth, of the succession of the popes, and that one of them, Alexander VI., had conferred upon Charles V., king of Spain, the power of controling the countries of the New World. Then he called upon the inca to submit to the king, acknowledge the pope, lay down his arms, and pay tribute.

"Why should I pay tribute to this Charles, who is inferior to God and even the pope. I desire to be subject to the gods alone. I know nothing about your pope, nor his right to dispose of my kingdom; and as for renouncing the religion of my ancestors, it will be time enough to do that when you establish the truth of your own."

When this answer was received Pizarro opened with his artillery. Two thousand were killed, three thousand taken prisoners, with an amount of booty which the richest of our day do not possess.

Who but a Christian can see what right Pizarro had to kill these unoffending people—what right he had to their gold and silver? But it was impossible at that day for him to understand that a Christian could rob or outrage or murder an idolator.

Christians hav never learned fair play. If they hear of an Infidel who is a little lax in his morals, they attribute it to the influence of Infidelity. But when an Infidel is eminently honest, then the tactics vary—his honesty is attributed to the seeds of Christian influence sown around him in his youth.

I do not say that this is owing to ignorance. I would not like to say that it is owing to dishonesty. Doubtless, like the inquisitorial tortures, it is owing to Christianity. Of all the self-conceited people ever born, Christians cap the climax. Our system of education, our civilization, every humanizing influence, all that is grand and ennobling, is claimed as the result of Christian influence.

Nobody will deny that England was a Christian country a hundred and fifty years ago; but what kind of schools did she hav? I select England because she is considered one of the most enlightened Christian countries on the globe.

Her schools were places where the crudest superstitions were taught. Teachers were not selected on account of their ability to teach, but on account of their devotion to Christianity. The working classes did not receive anything like what we would consider an education, even for the poorest. They lived in huts not much better than pig-sties. Men, women, and children lived in one room with a ground floor. Indeed, the poor of Christian Ireland fare not much better to-day.

Rich Christians rioted in luxury; poor Christians fared like brutes. That is the way Christianity carried on the work of civilization a hundred and fifty years ago.

When John Howard commenced the investigation of the prison system of England, he found in many prisons men and women herded together like swine—the young of both sexes for slight offenses confined with hardened wretches and daily subjected to the vulgar slang and sottish examples of those who had grown old in crime. Every prisoner before being released had to pay the jailer a certain fee. Many who had been sentenced only for a short time were kept in confinement for long periods, because while in prison they had no means of paying the jailer's fee.

In one instance he found a rickety old jail where men and women were chained to the wall during the day and to the floor during the night. In every prison the jailer had the privilege of selling all the liquor to the prisoners that they could pay for. That must hav been an exhibition of Christian morality, for there was a chaplain in every prison.

In some of these prisons he found ground floors with water oozing from the bottoms. On these straw had been thrown, which had been reduced to a muddy paste by being trampled upon. In these stinking pens men and women were allowed promiscuous intercourse, and children were born in them.

Was not such barbarism the legitimate fruit of Christianity? At that time there was not one known Infidel in office in all England.

Here is a picture of Christian civilization.

And such the effect of teaching from an old book filled with tyranny, filth, and fable; and such the part that Christianity has played in civilizing the world. Every time a man has taken a step in advance and demanded better conditions, he has received a blow from the Christian bludgeon.

And yet the first time that the great Brooklyn contortionist givs a spiritual exhibition he will prove as clear as two and two make five that Christianity has lifted the world from a state of ignorance and brutality up to its present high standing.

Why, the mariner's compass, the printing-press, the telegraph, and the steam-engin hav done more to civilize the world than all the popes and preachers who ever appeared on the face of the world with pretended missions from God to make fools of the people.

And yet all of these inventions hav met with bull-headed opposition from the church.

At the time spoken of in England, the only book considered necessary for the people was the Bible, and not one-tenth of them could read that.

A well-informed writer, speaking of England only a hundred years ago, says: "Few of the adults and none of the children could read. The whole of the laboring population was sunk in ignorance, thriftlessness, and vice."

At this time Christians were imprisoning Infidels for expressing their thoughts, and whipping those in public who dissented from the church creed. Remember, I am writing of one of the most enlightened Christian countries on the face of the globe.

In nearly all of the prisons were torture chambers where criminals were subjected to the thumbscrew, the iron boot, the spiked chair, the lash, and the rack. These chambers were underground, where the cry of the sufferer could not be heard. The victim was accompanied with a magistrate, a surgeon, the executioner, and a chaplain. In many instances these inhuman instruments were used to make men and women confess to crimes which they never committed. Every man who had a hand in these cruel tortures was a Christian.

James Parton says, "The man most instrumental in reforming these barbaric customs was Voltaire"—the man most hated by all Christians.

These terrible punishments hav always been peculiar to Christian countries, and hav been inflicted by authority of the Bible, the Christian's great civilizer. And, strange as it may seem, it was thought to be pleasing to God.

Just as long as Christians are "hell-bent" on helping God, our liberties are in danger. The worst tyrants and usurpers that ever cursed the earth hav had the sanction of God.

Whatever has been done in the name of God has generally militated against the interests of men. Whatever is done to gain heaven will make us miserable on earth. Whenever a minister fits a man for the mansion above he is unfit to liv below. Boonton stoned and fined Mr. Reynolds and rendered itself notoriously ridiculous before the country, and got credit for nothing but intolerance. Christianity is always doing something to-day which it is ashamed of to-morrow. Like a sheep in a quagmire, the more it struggles the deeper it sinks.

I learn by a Richmond, Va., paper that Prof G. H. Cook (not Joe Cook) has discovered some rare fossils at Boonton, N. J., but not a word is said about the fossils discovered by Mr. Reynolds when visiting the same locality. This field ought to be thoroughly explored, for there is no doubt that it is very rich in fossil remains. If some paleontologist is anxious to immortalize his name by some wonderful find, I would advise him to make a careful examination around the premises of Brooklyn's great evangelical hell-herder—perhaps he may find the "missing link." And then "Blare's" home offers some rare inducements. Shouldn't wonder if some great fossil crawfish might reward the searcher. And it might be well to look around Comstock's neighborhood—and the headquarters of the Young Men's Christian Association. Footprints of the split-footed ass, or the great "what-is-it," may be discovered. Let us unite in prayer.

To show the civilizing influence of the Christian religion on enlightened England, it is only necessary to mention that within the last century Dr. Priestly was driven out of that country on account of his religious views. He lay secreted and saw his house, library, apparatus, and all his valuable papers, the work of a lifetime, go up in smoke—the work of Christian fiends.

What had Dr. Priestly done to excite the ire of these Christian barbarians? Why, he had said and written what Christians did not like; and they burnt him out, and doubtless intended that he should perish in the flames.

Wherever the blighting influence of Christianity is felt, the same consequences follow. This country would be what it professes to be, a tolerably free country, were it not for the slavery which naturally follows in the wake of Christian belief.

A few years ago Talmage was going to set the chief of police on Colonel Ingersoll. What was the matter? Did not Colonel Ingersoll understand the rights and duties of an American citizen quite as well as the great theological slugger? Was he guilty of any crime against society? No. His crime was against Christianity. He had publicly dissected the theological goose. And this was just as great a crime for him in America as it was for Dr. Priestly in England. He had said something which displeased a Christian, and the police were to be let loose upon him.

It is no crime for Talmage to tell what he thinks, but it is a great crime for an Infidel to exercise the same privilege. It is easy enough to see how the people will fare if the government ever falls into the hands of such holy swabbers Make room, gentlemen. Brother Talmage will take up his cross.

The reason why I fight Christians is that in bargaining for their religion they bargain away my natural rights and privileges.

When Christians say that Infidels are bad and immoral, it is no evidence of badness and immorality. Who are the wicked and immoral? Those who do not attend church, nor believe the Bible, nor observe the Sabbath—in short, those who disagree with Christians. Those people are so bad that they are stoned and fined in Boonton; in other places they are imprisoned. John W. Hinckley lay in Ontario county jail three months for telling what he thought about the conception and birth of Jesus Christ.

A short time ago I witnessed the tricks of a trained dog, "Jo." The woman who owned him said, "Now, Jo, pray." The dog got down and stuck up his nose, and such an unearthly howl was never heard. "Hav a good time—get engaged—now, Jo, get the power;" and the dog whopped over and lay as motionless as though he were in a fit.

Well, I laughed heartily at the pranks of the devotional dog, but thought of no wickedness in either the owner or the dog. I have seen many humans in just such a fit. Many Christians would say that she is a very wicked woman. A hundred years ago they would hav imprisoned her and killed the dog.

Mrs. Whiteling, who killed her husband and children, and "Red-nosed Mike," the triple murderer, were sent up from the gallows with prayers and benedictions, and letters of introduction to St. Peter, and privileged to shine in the New Jerusalem, because they had been washed in the blood of the lamb. Such is Christian consistency.

I hav no doubt they will hear the loudest kind of a toot from Gabriel's long horn when they pass the pearly gates. It is to be hoped that "Blare" and Comstock and Talmage will not pass their "Sunday

Rest bill until they meet these boon companions on the "other side of the Jordan."

I hav received many letters from friends, who no doubt were actuated by the best motivs, who claim that they hav been very much interested in my articles, but deplore the abruptness of my language, especially my rough expressions in regard to God and the Christian religion. They say that "thoughts and words which shock will never reform"—that "I could accomplish twice as much good if I was more guarded in my expressions—that I am too sarcastic," etc.

In the first place, I apprehend that it is the bluntness of the truth, without any attempt at embellishment, which they unconsciously admire. In the second place the Christian's God is too ridiculous a phantom to command sober treatment. And as for the Christian religion, it is too absurd to be treated with anything but ridicule.

If I should see a nativ Kaffir with his dried snake-skin, I would be bound to treat him and his fetish with the utmost deference and respect for fear I might "shock" him.

But the Christian has a snake as well as the Kaffir. The Kaffir tells about the wonderful powers of his snake, and the Christian says that his snake damned the whole human race. One story is as reasonable as the other. I hav no more respect for the Christian's snake than for the Kaffir's. I am bound to treat both with contempt. But if you ridicule the Christians' snake story, they will be so "shocked" that all Boonton will begin to throw stones at you. And then some tenderfooted Liberal cries out, "Served you right; you had no business to 'shock' a Christian."

Hav Christians shown such tenderness for fear they would "shock" us? Does not the story of blowing down walls of solid masonry with rams' horns "shock" common sense?

Do Christians think about the "shock" produced by the stale lies told about Thomas Paine, which hav been told a thousand times and as many times refuted? On an average, once a month a lie is set afloat about Colonel Ingersoll or some member of his family. And Christians are only grieved because these lies do not produce a greater "shock" than they do.

An old Indian made up his mind that the caudal appendage to his dog was entirely too long, and concluded to reduce it to regulation length. And so he cut off about an inch every day with his tomahawk. When asked why he did not cut it all off at once, he said, "Humph, too bad to cut 'em all off at one time!" Doubtless he thought it might "shock" the dog.

When a cancer is to be removed a competent surgeon does not cut a little each day, but lets in the knife to the very bottom. When a monster is to be destroyed, aim at the most vital part and use the most deadly weapon. Don't be all summer cutting off a dog's tail.

I tell you Heston has the right idea. He understands the force of ridicule when applied to the ridiculous. His aim is unerring, and he has the nerve to send the shaft home to the most vital part. Ridicule is the most powerful weapon when properly applied to the truly ridiculous.

What more can the clerical spoonies ask than to hav us make our lowest bow to them and speak of their phantom in the skies in terms of awe and veneration, and of themselvs as his especially appointed agents to expound his holy word—and to whom the greatest respect is to be shown?

I hav rummaged around for words, I hav hatcheled my brain, for expressions to show my contempt for the Christian's scheme and the Christian's God. My strongest thoughts are weakness, my sharpest words are pointless, my best efforts are but as a pop-gun when a fort is to be bombarded, language seems to be entirely inadequate, when I attempt to express my contempt for Christian inconsistencies.

When the absurdity of a merciful God who afflicts the children of men with floods and tornadoes, and sweeps away thousands at a breath, is shown up and treated with ridicule by philosophers and thinkers, and when the deception and hypocrisy of the black-coated gentry are held up to the scorn and contempt of sober-minded men, they will make up their minds that they are of no more importance in the world than other men, and will cease to impose upon the people with their hocus-pocus arts. JOHN PECK.

Naples, N. Y.

The Central Idea of "Nationalization."

The principles promulgated in Edward Bellamy's wonderful book, "Looking Backward," hav crystallized into living societies, which are forming or organizing all over the country, from Boston to southern California. The question is constantly asked by those who hav not read the book, what is the purpose of these Nationalists? What do they want, and how do they expect to accomplish their aims?

Their object is to benefit mankind by readjusting the industrial and economic systems which hav come down to us from semi-barbarous ages. How is this to be done? By substituting coöperation for competition, and emulation for rivalry and hatred. How are these changes to be inaugurated? Through legal and constitutional channels. How can we manipulate legal enactments? By educating the people to see the utility of the desired changes, and by the strength which comes of union. Is not education a slow process for the reformation of evils which already "cry to heaven" for redress?

Education is not a slow process for reforms which hav been germinating in the minds of advanced thinkers for centuries. When the world is ready for an advance movement, it sweeps like a tidal wave over the thought centers of the world, and lo! "a nation is born in a day." So it is with the system set forth by Edward Bellamy. It has been thousands of years in process of germination. Now the world is ready for it, and behold it sweeps across the continent like a prairie fire, stirring all hearts with courage and with renewed hope.

The changes contemplated are evolutionary, and not revolutionary, in their methods. The following extract from the declaration of principles, adopted by the parent club in Boston, and indorsed by the First club of San Diego, is evidence of this fact:

> No sudden or ill-considered changes are advocated; we make no war on individuals; we do not censure those who hav accumulated immense fortunes by carrying to a logical end the false principles on which business is now based.
> The combinations, syndicates, and trusts of which the people at present complain demonstrate the practicability of our basic principles of association. We merely seek to push the principles a little further, and hav all our industries operated in the interest of all by the nation, the people organized, the organic unity of the whole people.

The question arises, are such changes practicable? The effectiv working of the Universal Postal Union demonstrates that they are. A world telegraph union is now under discussion, and but for the telegraphy of the United States, which is owned and controled by private corporation, this change would be effected as a vast benefit to the world. In England, Germany, Belgium, Switzerland, and Italy, in which the telegraphs are under government control, the charges are less than they are here. Railroads could also be run better and cheaper under one general management than under the present competitiv system. It has been estimated by those well versed in the statistics and practical working of this business that the larger and more complicated this system, the easier and cheaper it can be manipulated under one general management. It is now admitted by those who profess to know that men can be transported across the continent for a dollar apiece without loss to the railroads. If this be so, it speaks volumes for the necessity of reform.

The admirable working of our public school system also indicates the superior efficiency of governmental control of interests which are "of the people, for the people, and by the people." And when all industries and public utilities are similarly managed, the government will not seem "a thing apart" from the people, but something in which all hav a personal and abiding interest.

Then will liberty, equality, and fraternity be realized for the first time on this planet, "the lion and lamb lie down together, and a little child shall lead them."

But before this grand consummation can be realized rent and interest, with their concomitant evils of mortgage and usury, must be eliminated from our economic system. Nature's resources, land, water, iron, coal, oil, gas, electricity, and all the products arising therefrom must belong to all of the children of earth alike. Labor and labor's products must be equalized by each taking the place to which he is best adapted, and all receiving equal reward for equal service, not to be measured by quality or the market value thereof, but by the time given to such labor.

The best way to begin these great industrial changes is in municipal affairs. Every city should own its own water, gas, electric lights, street cars, cable and motor roads, operas, parks, and other institutions of public benefit. These should be managed for the people by their chosen officers, who are accountable to the people in their municipal capacity for the faithful discharge of their several duties. In this way the millions which go to enrich private corporations through monopoly would go to the people in cheaper rates.

This principle, carried out in all the industries in the world, would abolish poverty and nabobism at the same time. The vast army of non-producers who now liv off the labor of others would help to swell the ranks of honest industry, and this applied to nature's yet undeveloped resources, would make enough wealth for all to enjoy the grand ultimate of life: health, peace, and confidence—which in harmonious minds constitutes happiness.

Having been appointed as corresponding secretary of the First Nationalists' Club of San Diego, and requested to formulate the central idea of their principles for the press, I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will accept them for publication. MARY A. WHITE, Ingersoll and Christ.

Christians declare that the teachings of Christ are absolutely perfect, without which civilization could not exist; and dire calamity is predicted for those who reject his teachings, and accept the sublime truths of the Ingersollian philosophy. The quotations given below show the difference between the teachings of the nineteenth century philosopher and the Galilean reformer.

CHRIST.	INGERSOLL.
I came not to send peace, but a sword (Matt. x, 34).	Science will bring, not a sword, but peace.
Lay not up for yourselvs treasures upon earth (Matt. vi, 19).	The prosperity and glory of our country depends upon the number of people who are the owners of homes.
For I am come to set a man at variance against his father, and the daughter against her mother, . . . and a man's foes shall be they of his own household (Matt. x, 35, 36).	If there is any heaven in this world it is in the family. It is where the wife loves the husband, and the husband loves the wife, and where the dimpled arms of children are about the necks of both.
If any man come to me and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple (Luke xiv, 26).	There is no happiness in a home not filled with love. Where the husband hates his wife—where the wife hates the husband—where the children hate their parents and each other—there is a hell upon earth.
Take no thought for your life, what ye shall eat, or what ye shall drink; nor yet for your body what ye shall put on. . . . Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow; they toil not neither do they spin. Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? What shall we drink? or, Wherewithal shall we be clothed? The morrow shall take thought for the things of itself. Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof (Matt. vi, 25, 34).	Science points out the ends that can be accomplished; fixes our attention on the affairs of this world, and erects beacons of warning on the dangerous shores. It seeks to ascertain the condition of health, to the end that life may be enriched and lengthened. It seeks to giv food and shelter and raiment, education and liberty, to the human race.

Lectures.

The local press frequently contain several columns in a single issue of notices concerning Mr. Jamieson's lectures. At one of the towns visited the editor of the Nodaway Democrat offered his readers these observations:

Prof. W. F. Jamieson, a Freethought lecturer of wide notoriety, favored those citizens of Maryville who would hear him, with a course of three lectures, commencing on last Friday night at Union Hall. The professor makes bold to say that he does not believe in the supernatural. His position is that if it should turn out finally that man is immortal, that fact will be due to the fiat of nature. So far as the term Infidel is concerned it is not one of so much reproach as many think. It simply means a want of belief in some one else's doctrin, or an unfaithfulness to the prevalent doctrin. Martin Luther was an Infidel to the prevailing church of his day, and like the Freethinkers of to-day, he demanded and contended for the right of private judgment. Freethinkers say that reason is man's best guide—though not an infallible one. They are devoted to this world—their motto is one world at a time. Make the largest possible progress in this life, and if there is another, it is time enough to engage in its duties when we enter it. The Christian makes the Bible his infallible guide, and he hopes for life beyond. But his hope after all is only tantamount to the Freethinker's Agnosticism. The one hopes but he does not know. The other simply says, "I do not know." The speaker claimed that nearly all the great men of science were Infidels, and that every important discovery or invention, when first announced, had been opposed and denounced as the work of the devil. The great book of nature is superior to every other and all other books. The Christian asks the Freethinker, if he does away with the Bible, what will he replace it with. Need the latter blush to say that he will let the book of nature take its place—the only book in all the universe where knowledge, original and absolute, is to be obtained?

In his second lecture, the professor devoted much of his time in response to a question, to show that the Bible and science conflict. He cited some twenty instances wherein he claimed there is a direct conflict. There was the case of Joshua commanding the sun to stand still. Science has no record of any such event. Science says that such a thing could not occur, yet the Bible says it did occur. Then we are told in the Bible that Elijah was transported to heaven in a chariot of fire. How much science in that? How much science in the story of Jonah and the whale? In the story of the flood even? Then if we go to Genesis, we will find by the record there given that fruit-trees were growing on this earth before the sun was made. The speaker claimed the Bible to plentifully abound with such contradictions of science.

His third lecture, Sunday evening, was entitled, "Christianity as Represented by Sam Jones, versus Infidelity as Represented by R. G. Ingersoll." We did not hear this lecture.

As each of Mr. Jamieson's lectures lasted over an hour, no report that our space would permit would do justice to what he says. He is well informed and expresses himself quite vigorously. While not disposed to accept his conclusions, yet we believe in free speech. This is a large world. There are a great many people in it. It would not be well, if such a thing were possible, for all to entertain the same views. Let there be absolute freedom of thought and speech on the principle once announced by Jefferson, that error can be tolerated where reason is left free to combat it. Truth has certainly nothing to fear from investigation.

An Open Letter from President Westbrook.

DEAR FRIENDS: I hav so many letters of inquiry regarding the American Secular Union that I must reply in print. Yes, Mr. Stevens and Mrs. Freeman hav resigned, and Foote, Wettstein, and myself are the only officers remaining. But we are firm and hopeful, and expect to make a good report to the Congress next month. I could say much of the mistakes of the past, but I prefer to speak of the future. As to the coming Congress, I am in favor of making it mainly a business conference having little, if any, public platform speaking. The time has come for deliberate action. If our friends all over the country do not feel interest enough to attend this meeting in the present crisis, I want to know it. Those who cannot possibly attend should write me fully and freely as to their views and purposes, and let me know how much money they can afford to giv for next year's campaign. All our friends are cordially invited to take part in this conference, whether they are regular delegates or not. I am in favor of amending our constitution by making it shorter and yet more explicit. Several classes of Liberals, outside of "orthodox Infidels," should be interested and activly employed in promoting our Nine Demands. The Spiritualists are probably the most numerous class of Liberals in the world, and would all favor secular government if properly treated. So with the Free Religionists, the Unitarians, Universalists, Hicksite Quakers, progressiv Jews, the various German societies and labor reform associations, and last but not least, the Ethical Culturists. It remains to be seen whether we are wise enough and broad enough to enlist all these reformers. Indeed, there is no reason why we should not enrol in the ranks of state secularization multitudes of Catholics and orthodox Protestants.

But we must confine ourselvs, as an organization, to the one object of a complete separation of church and state, while as individuals we may hold and work for our own peculiar views. We need more thorough organization, and in fact we ought to hav a legal existence by an act of incorporation. This I could get through the courts of Philadelphia.

There are other matters of practical importance that will be apparent in the proposed amendments to our constitution, of which the required notice will be given soon. Meanwhile let us keep things in motion and come together next month in a good Liberal spirit, prepared to bury the dead past, and to meet the situation in the true spirit of heroic patriotism.

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

The Convention at Portland, Ore.

Here are some queries for discussion and decision.

Nothing can be done without money.

Can we avoid constant begging?

How shall the needed funds be obtained?

Is it advisable to form a real society, with a genuin membership, payment of membership fee and semi-annual dues in advance?

If so, what shall be the amounts?

How can we best encourage the formation of local Liberal Unions?

What is the best plan for their organization?

What should be the duties of their officers and committees?

How should local Unions be conducted?

What is the best means to keep up interest?

How can science schools on Sunday be successfully conducted without a professional teacher?

How can we best promote sociability?

How best develop home talent?

How most surely interest and enlist women as earnest workers?

What can be done to make provisions for the aged and totally disabled, and for the widows and orphans of Liberals left otherwise unprovided for?

Shall the executiv committee consist of three or five?

Do we need a secretary for the joint state Union, who shall be held to strict accountability for the performance of his duty—one who will cheerfully and conscientiously devote ten hours, and when necessary twenty hours, of the twenty-four, three hundred and sixty-five days in the year, to practical work for the cause?

On whom shall we inflict the position?

Are we willing to evince equal self-sacrifice and insure to such a secretary fair remuneration?

Should it be made the duty of the secretary to keep a daily corrected list of the names and addresses of the earnest workers in the two states, cultivate their acquaintance, keep in correspondence with them, and induce them to send him reports of all items of interest and the needs in their vicinity?

Should the secretary cull the items of greatest interest from all available sources, especially articles in the leading newspapers favoring the Nine Demands, thus gathering a weekly budget of interesting items, and send copies of such items to Liberals throughout the two states who hav influence and interest to secure their publication in local papers?

Should he solicit Liberals of ability to write articles on each of the Nine Demands, and himself gather from all sources facts and arguments that shall make short, bright, incisiv leaflets, so written that they can be handed to Bible devotees, awakening them to thought, while lulling their prejudice, yet of such interest they will be preserved, shown to friends, read and reread with avidity by all classes? (Published without display of the names of the society, or the name of any known Liberal; such display of names deters Christians from reading.)

Shall the working members be supplied with such leaflets for gratuitous distribution?

Should the printing of such leaflets be paid for from the funds of the Union?

Should the secretary send them to working Liberals with hints as to the best methods of circulating them in the strongholds of the enemy, and thus force people to discuss these issues, and educate the intelligent to full comprehension of the justice of our Nine Demands?

Would not the leaflets intensify the interest in the items furnished the local newspaper, and would not items in the local newspaper giv increased value and interest to the leaflets?

Where there is interest and desire for lectures, but the Liberals so few they are unable to meet the entire expense, should the secretary, under the advice of the president and executiv committee, arrange with the lecturer who may be in that vicinity, or can make it en route, to deliver lectures, organize local Unions, etc.?

Should the treasurer pay such lecturer balance due for such services from the funds of the Union?

Should the president, vice-presidents, secretary, and executiv committee, each and all, keep wary watch on both state legislatures, and be prepared to counteract the nefarious schemes of the various combinations of fanatics? And whenever they attempt to influence legislation should the secretary promptly send out leaflets on the question at issue to all the workers for immediate circulation, and urge all and every member of the Union in that state to write urgent letters to the member of the legislature from their district to oppose the schemes of the fanatics, and use every influence to induce friends and neighbors to do likewise?

Should it be the duty of the secretary to prepare and, with all possible dispatch, send to all the workers short, able, telling articles on the question in issue, suitable for the local newspapers?

Should it be the duty of the secretary to personally appear before the legislativ committee and defend our rights, and expose and defeat the schemes of the enemies of liberty?

In case of religious persecution of any member of the Union, should the secretary, under the advice of the president and executiv committee, at once flood the place and adjoining counties with leaflets, giving the arguments on the issue involved? Should he go at once to the place, and deliver speeches in hall, or if need be, in public square, day and night?

Should the executiv committee secure able counsel to defend the persecuted member, and make the power and influence of our organization felt?

What shall we do to secure competent persons to deliver orations, and conduct funeral services, and thus avoid the insults to our dead, so often the result of ministers presiding?

Liberals of Oregon and Washington, these are among the momentous questions awaiting your consideration and decision. Come to the great convention at Portland, Ore. (Oct. 12th, 13th, and 14th), prepared to giv us the benefit of your best judgment. Come resolved to decide, and adopt the best, most practical, plan presented, so all can, in perfect harmony, zealously work to secure the greatest good to the greatest number, and place Oregon and Washington in the vanguard of Freethought.

C. B. REYNOLDS.

A Learned Jew's View of Jesus.

From the New York Sun.

[The Sun introduces this article to its readers in the following editorial notice: "We reprint to-day from that able Jewish magazine, the Menorah, a very striking article by Dr. E. Schreiber on the life, career, character, and teachings of Jesus the Christ. The attitude assumed toward the subject may seem almost profane to sincere Christians; but Dr. Schreiber writes so temperately, so philosophically, and with so manifest a desire to adhere to historical truth, that his argument will be respectfully regarded by them. It is a view of the founder of Christianity to which they are not accustomed, and for that reason they will giv all the more attentiv consideration to it, especially as it is not presented in a controversial spirit, and in a tone that is offensiv."—ED. T. S.]

The expectation of the messiah had long been rife among the Jews. . . . The political situation was intolerable. The Roman yoke had been fastened upon the neck of the people, and the weight of oppression became tenfold more difficult to support from the sweet taste of liberty that had preceded it after the brief spell of independence in the days of the Maccabees. The rapacity of the Roman governors knew no bounds. A land impoverished by incessant wars and the frequent failure of the crops was drained of its last resources to satisfy the enormous exactions of a foreign despot, and, most humiliating of all, it was Rome, a nation of idolators, which was thus permitted to grind the chosen people. Pilate missed no opportunity for confiscations, and private estates being insufficient to gratify his rapacity, he seized upon the temple treasures under a ridiculous pretext. Great despair seized upon the minds of the people. In such times moderation is no virtue, and people choose men for their favorits who will come forward with burning zeal, with a fervor of patriotism bordering upon raving madness. Such men were found and called "kanneem," or "zealots," who nurtured an implacable hatred against tyrannical rule. Such unrelenting leaders were Judah Gaulonitis and Thendos, both of Galilee, both proclaiming it a crime against religion to obey the earthly empire of Rome, and both were crucified by the Romans for treason against the senate, as crucifixion was the Roman fashion of public execution of criminals.

There was still another Galilean, charged and guilty of the crime of inciting the populace to rebellion against Rome. He, too, was crucified, and his name was Jesus of Nazareth.

Jesus of Nazareth was nothing less than a political martyr. He, too, like Judah of Gaulonitis, had the motto, "There is but one kingdom; it is the heavenly kingdom, the kingdom of God." Galilee was always the hotbed of revolutions. The people there were inflamed by the idea that this world was breaking down, and a new one, the future world, would soon appear. While others merely counseled preparation for the heavenly kingdom, promising that a complete reformation of the world would take place, Jesus had the courage and self-confidence to proclaim: "The time is fulfilled, the heavenly kingdom has come, and I am this king or messiah, the savior of my oppressed people." He was a Jew, a Pharisean Jew, with Galilean coloring; a man who joined in the hopes of his time, and believed these hopes were fulfilled in him. He was brought before a court, and it seems that not a large number of followers were with him, otherwise it would hav been dangerous to pronounce judgment against him. Pilate, the Roman procurator, asked him: "Art thou the king of the Jews?" He answered: "Thou sayest it." Now, as the Jews were Roman subjects, is it a wonder that he was not treated better than any other rebel, but shared the fate of Judah of Gaulonitis, and was crucified? Why, he wouldn't fare better to-day under similar circumstances in any land in Europe. He had boldly attacked all political conditions, and the whole civil, social, and religious society of his time, and paid the penalty of all political martyrs.

And now a few words as to the vexed question of the part the Jews hav played in this tragedy. The gospels are in themselvs not agreed when the trial scene took place. But no matter which of them we follow, the whole account of the trial and execution is flagrantly out of keeping with well-known principles of the Jewish criminal law. Jesus's trial takes place at night, which is an infraction of the Jewish penal code, which orders capital trials to take place in daytime. It takes place in the private house of the high priest, but the Jewish law lays down the principle that trials must take place in the chamber appointed for the purpose in the temple. The execution takes place on a holiday, or, as another account has it, a day previous, but Jewish law does not permit executions to take place on a holiday or the eve of a holiday. Jesus is condemned on his own confession, but according to Jewish law this cannot be done. Two witnesses had to testify to the truth of the charge, and it had also to be shown that the defendant had been warned. The charge seems to hav been blasphemy, because Jesus said: "I am the son of God," but everyone familiar with the prophets must know that they frequently speak of Israel as sons of God, so that it is hardly probable for a Jewish tribunal to sentence a man to death for merely repeating a biblical phrase. That crucifixion is not a Jewish mode of punishment is well known; the Jewish law knows only death by the sword (harag), by the rope (chenekh), by stone (szekeelah), and by fire (szeraipha).

The discrepancies, divergences, and glaring mistakes are so little in harmony with the well-established rules of procedure in a Jewish tribunal, that the account of the trial scene, from whatever point we may study it, cannot pass as historical.

Now the question arises: Where is the novelty of Jesus's work? It has been said, for instance, to consist in the overthrow of Phariseeism. But while he now and then rebukes severely some extravagant and unworthy members of the Pharisees he never reproached the party as such. On the contrary, he said: "The Pharisees sit in Moses's seat, and whatsoever they bid you observe, that observe and do." The Pharisees were certainly not a "race of hypocrits" and a "generation of vipers." A writer living before the destruction of the temple could not hav called the Pharisees a band of hypocrits. The Sadducees were more hypocritical slaves of the letter than the Pharisees, who were the party of the people, the progressiv friends of the national cause. Let us not forget that, in the main, Jesus himself adhered to their principles; that what is called "the Sermon on the Mount" has been time and again proved to be contained in the prophets and contemporaneous Jewish writings, whose authors were Pharisees. The so-called Golden Rule had been proclaimed by the Pharisee Hillel thirty years before Christ, and Hillel must hav learned it from the Greek Isocrates.

If we read the gospel of Matthew carefully we will find that Jesus does not attempt to abrogate the Pharisaic laws, but only insists upon the great importance of the commandments of the heart. "Woe," he cries, "for ye pay hither of mint, of anis, and cumin, but ye hav omitted the weightier matters of the law: judgment, mercy, and faith; these ought ye to hav done, and not to leave the other undone." But such doubtless recommendable sayings we find in the first chapter of Isaiah, in the sixth chapter of Micah, in the Psalms and Jeremiah much more emphatically expressed. He also said that "not one jot or tittle shall pass from the law." He only denounces the ceremonies of the age when they interfere with the superior claims of the moral law. But there is nothing new in this. He did not abolish the Sabbath. "The Sabbath was made for man, but man is not made for the Sabbath," is a Jewish saying, and the Talmudic Halakah teaches that danger to life sets aside Sabbatical prohibitions of any character.

Did he preach a new prayer, as is so often claimed? No, the prayer with the chaste introduction, "Our Father who art in heaven," is a combination of Jewish prayers; not a sentiment in it is foreign to the Judaism of his day. Nor is the novelty of Jesus's work to be found in the extension of the gospel to the heathen world. This was the work of the Apostle Paul. Jesus, on the contrary, most emphatically said: "I am not sent but unto the lost sheep of the house of Israel," and he charges his apostles: "Go ye not into the way of the gentiles, and into any city of the Samaritans enter ye not. Go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, and as ye go, preach, saying the kingdom of heaven is at hand."

There are, however, some new features in Jesus's teachings which are not contained in the Jewish writings before him. "Love your enemies," is such a doctrin. But let us be candid; such a gushing love is not only impracticable but impossible. Our religion teaches: Do not revenge nor bear any grudge. Do not rejoice at the fall of thy enemy. If thy enemy is hungry, giv him to eat; if thirsty, giv him to drink; if his animal is going astray, bring it back to him. This is as far as humanity can go. What is beyond this is unnatural. Jesus also taught that his followers should renounce earthly treasures. This doctrin is neither new nor good.

The Jewish sect of the Essenes had practically carried out this system of poverty and communism nearly two centuries before Jesus. But it has never found favor among Christians. While certain Catholic orders did not and do not permit their monks to hav a goodly share of the things of this world, the monasteries, the church and its dignitaries, hav the more. The financial condition of Christendom to-day is a flashing commentary on this communistic principle of Jesus. And while some envious, pious Christians never tire to accuse the Jew of being a money-getter, they do not seem to care much about the eye of a needle and a camel, or to be particularly fond of another command of Jesus: "If any man will sue thee at the law, and take away thy coat, let him hav thy cloak also" (Matt. v, 40–47). Moses knew and appreciated the value of earthly treasures, and did not command us to disregard them, while Jesus's doctrin in this respect is dangerous to society, to industrial progress and civilization.

Another doctrin of Jesus, not to care for the morrow, or the carpe diem principle of Horace, is surely not one which has helped to make the United States of America what it is.

Nor the principle: Whosoever shall smite thee on thy right cheek, turn to him the other also; thou shalt not only suffer, but even divest thyself of all sense of honor, thou shalt be a coward in this respect—was not the one which has helped to build up true manhood, character, courage, and fortitude.

Nor do we find the precepts attributed to Jesus limited to the Jews and Christians. Buddha, long before Hillel and Jesus, said: "Hatred is not conquered by hatred at any time; hatred is conquered by love." This is an old rule. Lucius, Seneca, and Epictetus, following the Stoics, arrive at many of the doctrins taught in the "Beatitudes." In the writings of Plato and in the teachings of Socrates, as preserved by Plato and Xenophon, we come upon this higher spirit. The principle that we should rather suffer than do injustice, insisted on so often as Christian, is distinctly and beautifully taught not only in the Talmud, but in the Gorgias of Plato by the grand old man of Greek philosophy—by Socrates, the same who, though he could hav evaded the law, preferred to drink the poisoned chalice, and to become a martyr of his convictions, saying: "I should gain nothing by delaying to take the draught for a few moments, except to laugh at myself for having clung so eagerly to the remnant of a life that had already run its course."

Strange are the ways of providence. There is a man, who for purity of motiv, for courage of his opinions, and loftiness of thought, and all the attributes which go to make the true man, has been surpassed by no man in history; this man died for his faith, and yet he remained simple Socrates. Had he lived in an age of religious superstition and moral decrepitude, and among people crushed under the heel of iron tyranny, we doubt not we should hav had another messiah in him.

True, Jesus died a martyr for his ideas, but he was only one of the endless galaxy of martyrs who suffered in the cause of humanity, enlightenment, progress, and science.

The Greeks sacrificed the revealer of human conscience, the Romans the tribune of social reform, the Florentines the precursor of modern revolutions, the Britons the prophet of religious tolerance, the French the Titan of democratic principles, the Spaniards the discoverer, almost the creator, of a new world in the immensity of the ocean. They were all soldiers in the great army of mankind, battling in the cause of morality and righteousness; by their sufferings hav they helped to draw onward and forward the car of progress.

D. E. SCHREIBER.

Cardinal Gibbons's Pastoral.

Last Sunday in all the churches over which Cardinal Gibbons is head there was read the following pastoral letter from that prelate:

A mingled feeling of righteous wrath and deep sympathy was bred in every Catholic heart when the news came that in Rome impious men dared to unveil the statue of an apostate monk to the admiration and veneration of the thousands assembled, dragging the memory of a wild theorizer, a shameless writer and denier of the divinity of Christ, from the obscurity of a grave that had for three centuries closed upon its disgrace.

These men, backed by mere brute force, hav set upon a pedestal in the holy city the statue of the infamous Bruno.

Such a proceeding is a flagrant outrage upon the Catholic and Christian world. It is a deliberate and well-aimed blow at all that is sound and wholesome in religion and morals. Its animus is clear, from selection of time and place and the unchristian and defiant language employed in the unveiling of a statue of a man whose whole life breathed cowardice, pride, and defiance of lawfully constituted authority. In their frantic efforts after miscalled freedom they hav spurned the truth, which alone could make them free.

Theirs is not the action of decent, honorable but misguided men, calmly, and with due regard to the feelings of others, promulgating a new belief. Their attempt is not so much to honor Bruno as to insult and vilify the vicar of Christ and his devoted children through Christendom.

They hav chosen, as the committee to further the movement, the champions of Atheism, the would-be destroyers of the very foundations of Christianity.

It is proper that the Christian world, and especially this portion, and where the term "religious freedom" is understood in a Christian sense, should brand with their indignant scorn an action such as this.

We are not yet ready for processions in which the red and the black flags of revolutionists and Anarchists are defiantly flaunted.

A CARDINAL BESIDE HIMSELF.

From the New York Times.

Cardinal Gibbons may be right in asserting that the statue of Giordano Bruno in Rome was erected "not so much to honor Bruno as to insult and vilify the vicar of Christ," but he is wrong in abusing that philosopher as he does in the pastoral letter, extracts from which hav been telegraphed from Baltimore. Anger at a public event which was probably calculated for political effect does not justify a churchman in returning to the violent abuse and the misrepresentations which in A.D. 1600 brought a witty and learned genius to the fagot. Such an exhibition of bad temper and bad language will shock laymen who are devoted to their church but do not propose to defend the misdeeds of the past. Our forefathers in New York burnt negroes at the stake on the flimsiest proofs of a conspiracy for murder and arson; those of New England hanged innocents for witches and whipped Quakers; but we are not called upon to defend such revolting things. Protestants as well as Catholics are tarred with the same stick. But it is reserved for prelates like Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore to issue what is no more and no less than an implied justification of poor Giordano Bruno's long imprisonment and cruel death.

The cardinal calls Bruno a "wild theorizer, a shameless writer, and a denier of the divinity of Christ." To hav understood and made himself the champion of the discovery of Copernicus that there are many systems of suns, that the earth moves round our sun, and that the old childish astronomy was impossible, is not very wild; Catholic text-books teach these facts now. He was not shameless who gave in his dedication of the "The Infinit Universe and Innumerable Worlds" this dignified but sad glimpse of the furor theologicus of his day: "But now, for describing the field of nature, for being solicitous about the pasture of the soul, for being curious about the improvement of the understanding, and for showing some skill about the faculties of the mind: one man, as if I had an eye to himself, does menace me; another, for being only observed, does assault me; for coming near this man he bites me, and for laying hold of that other he devours me. 'Tis not one who treats me in this manner, nor are they a few; they are many, and almost all." Nor was he exactly a denier of the divinity of Christ, unless we hold to the limited view which many good men, the cardinal among them, conscientiously take.

Cardinal Gibbons goes distinctly beyond the warrant of history in saying that Bruno was a man "whose whole life breathed cowardice, pride, and defiance of lawfully constituted authority." He would not and could not submit to be lectured by ignorant superiors, many of whom were wicked and depraved; his revolt was not cowardice. Nor is it fair to call him a coward if it should be true that at some period of his imprisonment he recanted. For the prelate who is so lavish of harsh words might stumble, too, if his mind and body had been subjected to the tortures of the Inquisition. That Bruno had intellectual pride is true, and therein lies almost the only statement made by the cardinal which can be substantiated from the facts. But to say that is merely to affirm that Bruno was a man. Can the cardinal himself feel that he is free from that crime?

For his allusion to "the infamous Bruno" there is, of course, no excuse, but the cardinal goes on to connect the philosopher with Atheists, revolutionists, and Anarchists. The link between Giordano Bruno and these men is not very obvious if we consider his writings. It is true that he satirized the church in "The Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast," wherein the gods of Olympus chase from heaven the beasts of the constellations and replace them with virtues like Truth, Law, Wisdom, Prudence. He also has been said to hav paved the way for Spinoza's negativ philosophy, and has even been included among the thinkers who did something to open the road to the theory of evolution. But he was not an Atheist nor a revolutionist nor an Anarchist. It appears, however, that the committee in charge of the statue was composed of men to whom the cardinal allots those unsavory names. But why fall foul of Giordano Bruno's memory because the men selected to honor him are opposed to the church? Would it not be better, would it not be more truly Christian, to keep silence over a man who fell a victim to the recrudescence of paganism in the church, to the old heathen execution by the flames? A prelate who is so touchy regarding the past of his church might well sit for atonement in sackcloth and ashes, and thank God that the courage and wisdom of men of the Bruno type hav purged theologians forever of such revolting crimes.

Romanism and the Public Schools.

From the American Sentinel.

Sunday, Aug. 11, 1889, in Oakland, Cal., there was dedicated a new Roman Catholic institution called St. Mary's College. It is four stories high above the basement, shaped something like the letter E, with a center and northern and southern wings. The frontage is 180 feet, north wing 150 feet, and southern wing 140 feet. It is estimated that nearly ten thousand people were present at the ceremonies. The Catholic father Gleeson delivered the dedicatory address. He inveighed so heavily against the public school system of the United States that his speech excited much attention. Urgent requests hav come to us from friends of the Sentinel to print it so that they can hav it for future reference. We hav consented to do so. We are satisfied that we are doing our subscribers good service in laying it before them. In view of the urgent demand now being made by Protestants for an amendment to the national Constitution establishing religious instruction in the public schools, ostensibly as a defense against Romanism, it is important to know just what the Romish position is; and it becomes doubly important when it is seen that the Protestant demand is in principle identical with the Romish. From Mr. Gleeson's speech it will be clearly seen that if the Protestant demand be acceded to and religious instruction be established in the public schools, it will be a direct play into the hands of the Romish system.

Such comments as we are allowed at this time hurriedly to make, we hav interspersed through the speech in larger type.

After a few introductory remarks, Mr. Gleeson said:

The country is at present becoming alarmed at the crimes, the excesses, and dishonesty of many of its public servants. Men are beginning to see and to understand that something additional is needed for a competent public official than merely technical qualification for office. They are beginning to see that neither bonds, nor prisons, nor public opinion, nor social ostracism are of themselvs enough to restrain the average man from the commission of crime when the temptations to unfaithfulness are numerous and strong. In a word, the records of the number and magnitude of the public defalcations which hav occurred and are constantly occurring in this land are beginning to open the eyes of the more thoughtful and reflectiv in the community to the usefulness and even necessity of the inculcation of ethical principles in connection with the education of youths, and this, if I mistake not very much, is why institutions of this kind are growing steadily in favor and popularity with the best and most conservativ men of our times.

Nor are these crimes, excesses, defalcations, and this dishonesty carried on outside of all the membership of the Roman Catholic church. Let anyone notice the names of the boodlers, the jury bribers, the embezzlers, and election defrauders, and he will see that this is so. It is well known that the great majority of the Roman Catholic people of the United States are of the Irish race, and that the great majority of the children of these are educated and trained in the Roman Catholic schools; whereas, the educating or training of an American child in the Catholic school is the exception; these, on the contrary, are taught in the public schools. Yet, in the city of New York, the department of charities and corrections was called upon to care for only 63,178 Americans in the four years from 1871 to 1875, while in the same time it had to care for 98,737 Irish. The number of Americans was only one per cent of the American population of that city, while the number of Irish was three and a half per cent of the Irish population. Which shows that children sent forth from Roman Catholic schools stand three and a half times the chance of becoming paupers that they do when sent forth from the public schools.

Next, as to crimes. In fifteen years and four months in New York city, ending with 1875, there were arrested 571,497 Irish and but 387,154 Americans. The number of Irish was 3.28 per cent of the Irish population, while the number of Americans was but one per cent of the American population; which plainly shows that a child trained in the Roman Catholic school stands three and a quarter times the chances of getting into jail that the child does who is trained in the public school. In other words, there is more than three and a quarter times the probability that a child taught in the Roman Catholic schools will commit crime than there is that a child taught in the public schools will do so. This evidence might be extended over other lines to the length of a separate article in itself, and it would show the same results or worse. Then let the Roman Catholic system show anywhere near such results as the public school system shows before Roman Catholic priests repeat such charges against the public schools.

The work, then, that this college proposes to do will be of a dual character; that is to say, it will be of an intellectual and moral kind. It will develop the intellectual faculty and cultivate the moral instincts. By the former it will provide the community with capable officers, and by the latter with faithful servants. Thus it will become an agent for general good and a powerful factor in promoting and guarding the common interests, for from this institution will go forth, in all human probability, as time rolls by, several, if not very many, of those gifted youths who, as they come to take their places in society, will become the leaders, the guides, and representativs of the people—men who will occupy some of the highest offices within the gift of the community—who will be amongst the administrators of justice, the expounders of law, and the defenders of the interests of the populace—men, in a word, whose voice will be heard at the bar, on the bench, and in the senate.

And how important is it not to hav men of this class in positions of trust, for what greater blessing can a community enjoy than an incorruptible judiciary—an enlightened and unpurchasable legislature, and faithful, conscientious civil authorities? I will not insist for a moment on the inculcation of so elementary a truth, for it must be clear to the minds of all.

But the work that this institution has cut out for itself does not stop even here. It has a still higher and nobler mission to accomplish; that is to prepare for eternity those of our faith who will be intrusted to its care—to prepare for the attainment of that noble and magnificent destiny for which God called us all into existence those Catholic youths who shall enter under its roof. This is the special, the principal object for which this college has been erected. And this now leads us very naturally to inquire how far a Christian combined with a secular education is superior to a merely secular one. As you are aware, there are two contradictory opinions entertained by the people of this country hereon. The one advocates and insists on the exclusion of all ethical principles from the region of the school-room, while the other equally as strongly calls for and demands their introduction. The upholders of the former, unfortunately for us, as well as for those who share our convictions, being entirely in the majority, and having the power in their hands, enforce without scruple or regard for the interests of the minority their ideas and will in this matter. Now, this seems to me to be a very illiberal, not to say illogical, position for any party in the community to assume. It is illiberal and unfair, because it forces a system of instruction on the unwilling acceptance of millions, regardless of their rights and interests; and it is illogical and inconsistent inasmuch as it is in conflict with the history, the traditions, and profession of this country as a Christian nation.

This is not a Christian nation. It is a civil nation. . . .

If the advocates of the present system of public instruction in this country were to abjure the Christian religion—if they were to proclaim themselvs to the world as unbelievers in Christian teaching—their position would be consistent and intelligible. But as long as they bear the Christian name, as long as they are pleased to be known as the followers of the redeemer of mankind, I see nothing but inconsistency and contradictions in their efforts to prevent the youth of the nation being educated in a Christian way. The present system of non-Christian education now prevailing in this land might be, and doubtless would be, admirably adapted, as far as principles are concerned, for a non-Christian country.

A non-Christian country is just what this is. Therefore by Mr. Gleeson's own words it is proved that the present system is admirably adapted for this country.

I know the pueril answer that many would readily return to this. It would be the old stereotyped one—that religion is for the church and not for the schools, and that a nation can be Christian without being taught to believe in connection with secular instruction. Unfortunately for those who advance this reason, it has to be acknowledged that one-half of this country never enter an ecclesiastical edifice of any denomination whatever.

If it be so that one-half the people of this country never enter an ecclesiastical edifice, then, at the very best, how can this be more than one-half of a Christian nation?

How, then, I ask, are the youth of the country to be made Christian?

If it is a Christian country already, then why do the youth need to made Christian? Do Christians need to be made Christians?

Perhaps some one may say by means of the Sunday-school, but the half of them don't go to the Sunday-school, and if they did it would amount to but little. For what can a youth learn in an hour on the Sunday? The Sunday-school I regard as little better than a sham, a delusion, and a mockery.

Under such circumstances, it surely is not to be wondered at that millions are ceasing to be Christians in this land. The fact is, the country is becoming to a large extent non-Christian. Statistics hav been published in San Francisco showing that thirty million of the inhabitants of this republic hav never been baptized. What does that mean? It establishes, I think, very clearly the fact that to a large extent we are Christian only in name.

True, and a Christian only in name is no Christian at all. Therefore, this being a non-Christian nation, the present public school system is "admirably adapted to its needs in this respect."

Perhaps this is the reason why the present system of education is so earnestly upheld by so many. If so, let its abettors avow their belief, and their advocacy and position will be consistent and intelligible. But if they will not, at least the God-fearing, right-minded, conscientious men of all denominations in the land ought not to allow themselvs to be deluded any longer, and they should ask themselvs the question, how far the present system of education in this country is responsible for the lack of belief that prevails in this land. I know, of course, that there are many well-meaning, honorable, high-minded Christian men in the community who are zealous upholders of the present system of public instruction. But hav these ever examined the system attentivly? hav they considered its tendencies and marked its results? I think not. On the contrary, they take it for granted that it is a good, an excellent—aye, a most perfect system. They are strongly prejudiced in its favor; and so when anyone raises his voice against it, or attempts to point out its defects, they become irritated and excited, and, like the silversmith of Ephesus, they raise a mighty commotion against us.

The fact is, the present system of education in this land is to the people of this country what that ugly, ill-shaped ærolite which was worshiped in the temple of Ephesus as a goddess in the days of St. Paul was to the people of Asia Minor. That is, it is the great Diana of the Ephesians, and woe to the man who dares to attack it rudely. But, like the Ephesian deity, it is worshiped because it is not understood; for, when stripped of its tinsel and gaudy surroundings, it is anything but the lovable object that people take it to be—nay, it is a mighty, monstrous, insatiable moloch to which the spiritual existence of millions of our little ones is being constantly sacrificed.

Having now directed your attention to the inconsistency of this non-Christian system of education in a Christian land, I will next ask you to consider the dangers and alarmingly deplorable consequences that are certain to result herefrom if persevered in for any considerable time. And when I speak of dangers and deplorable consequences I do not wish to be understood as employing these terms in the religious, but rather in a temporal—national sense. Later on I will show how religion is affected by this system, but for the present I desire you to view it in connection with national interests and national prosperity. In formulating the statement then that the present mode of instruction in use in this country is dangerous and hostil to the dearest and best interests of the republic, there are many I am sure who can readily imagin that I am attempting too much, for there are those, and indeed I suppose they are in the majority in this land, who actually believe that the prosperity of this country is dependent on the present system of education. They really, I believe, look upon it as the very basis of the social order—the pillars of the republic and the panoply and palladium of our national greatness. . . . How important is not the inculcation of moral principles into the minds of the young!

Mr. Gleeson again assumes the very thing that he should prove. The controversy is not whether religion and morality should be taught or not; it is not whether these are essential or not. This is all allowed. The question is, Shall the state teach religion and morality? The answer is, The state cannot do it. . . .

What France's ablest statesmen hav said in this regard has been echoed by England's foremost men. "Religion is not," says Lord Derby, "a thing apart from education, but is interwoven into its whole system. It is a principle which controls and regulates the whole mind and happiness of the people. Public education should be considered as inseparable from religion." "Religion," said Lord John Russell, "should regulate the entire system of disciplin. . . . To omit any inculcation of the duties of religion—to omit instructing the children in the principles of the love of God and the love of their neighbor, would be a grave, a serious, and irreparable fault." Now listen to what that very eminent statesman, Sir Robert Peel, said on this matter. "I am," said he, "for a religious as opposed to a secular education. I believe that such an education is only half an education, but with the most important half neglected."

These statements from Europeans, even granting that they mean all that Mr. Gleeson intends them to mean, are not pertinent to this discussion in the United States, because they were all but parts of the church and state systems of the nations in which they lived. The United States is away ahead of all that. Mr. Gleeson and all those who would put religion into the public schools are only trying to sway this nation back into the evil tide with those.

So say all Catholics, and so say also a large number of non-Catholics in this country, and though the majority be against us now, yet we hopefully look forward to the day when they will be on our side, and as ardent supporters as we are of religious combined with secular instruction. . . . And I would recommend the opinion of that great and noble-hearted Englishman, Mr. W. E. Gladstone, the "Grand Old Man," as he is called. "Every system," says Mr. Gladstone, "which places religious education in the background is pernicious." Mind you, Mr. Gladstone does not merely say that the purely secular system is defectiv, but he says it is pernicious.

Take for instance the department of history. Is this taught in a way that Catholics can approve of, or that leaves them without a reasonable ground of complaint? Is there nothing deficient in this branch of instructio? I wish, indeed, I were able to answer in the negativ, and to say no. But, unhappily, I am not, for as now taught the most important points of Christian history are kept carefully out of sight; they are wholly ignored, not being so much as alluded to, and so the system in this respect remains lamentably deficient, sadly imperfect, and consequently entirely below the standard that we hav a right to expect. The youth of our times and of our faith are accordingly kept in the profoundest ignorance of what they ought to know. Thus it is a historic fact that all the civilization of the world is Christian, and has been created by the Catholic church.

If this be so, why is not Mexico equal to the United States?

Whence has civil liberty been obtained, in what does it consist, and what are its advantages? Civil liberty, as you are aware, is one of the greatest blessings a man can enjoy. It may be defined, the protection by law of the life and property of the citizen. It consists in the provisions, no representation, no taxation; no trial, no condemnation; no crime, no punishment. These are the bases of the liberties of the people of this land and of all enlightened countries to-day in the world, and whence, I ask, hav they been derived? Is it from a pagan or non-Catholic source? Nothing of the kind. They hav come down to us from the old Catholic times; they are as ancient as the days of Alfred the Great; and when, for a time, they were forfeited to the people by the exactions of an arbitrary monarch, was it not by a Catholic people, led by an illustrious Catholic archbishop, that they were restored to their place in the government of the nation on the ever memorable and historic plains of Runnymede?

Yes, it was. Mr. Gleeson refers here to Archbishop Laughton and Magna Charta. And that "Catholic people" and "illustrious archbishop" were condemned for it all by Pope Innocent III., as conspirators against their lord, for "audacious wickedness committed in contempt of the apostolic see." Not only was the Catholic archbishop and the people thus condemned, but the great charter itself was condemned in these words: "We therefore, with the advice of our brethren, altogether reprove and condemn this charter, prohibiting the king, under pain of anathema, from observing it, the barons from exacting its observation; we declare the said charter, with all its obligations and guarantees, absolutely null and void." The appointment of the archbishop was annulled, and another substituted for him. Yes, Mr. Gleeson's statement is true, and with truth it has been observed that among the miracles of that age the greatest miracle of all was that a Catholic archbishop should be more of a patriot than he was a priest. Undoubtedly the only righteous miracle that ever appeared in the history of the Catholic church, and, consistently enough, the pope condemned it.

And now I ask once more, are such things as these ever taught our Catholic youth in the public schools of this land? Indeed they are not. They are not even hinted at, and so our young people are kept in the profoundest ignorance of what they ought to hav a right to know. May I not fairly ask then is that a just, an equitable system that will keep our people in shameful ignorance of what they ought to know?

And as it is in these instances which I hav now mentioned, so it is in every other where the honor and the glory of the Catholic church is concerned. In other words everything that can in any way tell for the credit of our holy religion is either kept out of view, or if mentioned at all, is set forth in so meager and half-hearted a way as to convey only a mere moiety of the truth. Hence it is not surprising that there are constantly leaving the schools of this country Catholic youths who are in the profoundest ignorance of many of the grandest truths of Christian history, as if these had never been written. They leave these schools without the remotest idea, without the slightest suspicion, of what the Catholic church has done for the interest of science and the diffusion of general knowledge. Nay, it is even more likely that they go forth with the impression that the Catholic church has been an impediment, a stumbling-block, in the way of learning. . . .

But it is not merely that this system of public school education in this country is defectiv in leaving out what it ought to teach, and thereby keeping the youth in our times in shameful ignorance of what they ought to know, but I furthermore charge it as being a vehicle of gross untruth. Don't imagin that I hav come here to-day to make a statement of this nature without being able to substantiate it. Well, many of you may hav heard of the commotion that was raised in Boston a couple of years ago by the introduction into the public schools of that city of a book in which it was stated that the doctrin of indulgences was a pardon for sins, and that as such the Catholic church commended their sale.

It was not so stated. It was said that they "were remissions of the penances imposed upon persons whose suit had brought scandal on the community." Then it was said that "in process of time they were represented as actual pardons of guilt, and the purchaser was said to be delivered from all his sins." All of which we at the time proved to be true by the evidence of Catholic history and Catholic archbishops.

Now, I need not go so far as Boston to find something of a like nature to this. The general history used in the higher grades in the public schools on the coast, up to very recently, and as far as I know may even yet, in some instances, has been Barnes's, and at page 438 of that work the author thus expresses himself on the subject of indulgences: "In 1517, there came into Saxony, one Tetzel, a Dominican friar (mark the discourteous language, one Tetzel), selling indulgences. The wickedness and impudence of this man, who was better fitted to receive than dispense pardon for sin, aroused general indignation." Now, if this means anything at all, it means that indulgences are a pardon from sin, and that as such they were sold by the Catholic church. Again, at page 321, the same writer tells his young readers that it was only in the sixth century that the pope of Rome became the head of the Catholic church.

When speaking of the conversion of the Lombards to Christianity, he says: "The people, who until the overthrow of the emperor had been accustomed to depend upon Rome for political guidance, naturally continued to look thither for spiritual counsel and (now mark me) the bishop of Rome insensibly became head of the Catholic church." That is, it was by political circumstances that the bishop or pope of Rome became the head of our holy church.

And that is the literal truth. It was altogether by religio-political circumstances that the bishop of Rome became the head of the Catholic church. The difficulty with the papal system is that it is diametrically opposed to everything that is true, and it would be impossible to teach any truth in the history of Europe in the Christian era that would suit that system.

Still again, at page 265 of the same work, the same writer complacently tells us that Julian the Apostate, the greatest enemy the Christian cause ever had on earth, not even excepting the cruel Nero or the bloody Diocletian, was an excellent man. And that is the history that the Catholics of our public schools are required to learn, that is the history that Catholic parents are required to purchase and put into the hands of their sons and daughters to learn. This I indignantly declare, is an insult to our reason and an indignity to our faith. It is an evil that should not be tolerated to exist for a day in our midst.

In point of disposition and character it is certain that Julian was a better man than either Constantine or Theodosius or Justinian; and a much better man than many of the popes.

What then is the duty of the loyal, God-fearing Christian men of this land? It is to make common cause against this common enemy. It is to check by every means in their power the onward march of the hosts of unbelief and Infidelity that are now solidly marching forward with such giant strides through the length and breadth of this great nation, and for the existence of which the common school system is mainly responsible.

Do not imagin that I am alone in entertaining this idea of the spread of unbelief and the cause to which it should be attributed. It has been publicly avowed and frankly acknowledged by the very mouthpiece of the apostles of Infidelity in this land, for has not that hater of everything Christian, Col. R. Ingersoll, openly declared that he regarded the public school buildings of this country as the future cathedrals of the nation?

We are not Infidels, nor are we haters of anything Christian, but we must confess that Mr. Ingersoll's statement is, we fear, not far wrong, in view of the attacks of both the Catholic hierarchy and the would-be Protestant hierarchy, upon the public school.

The duty of all loyal, God-fearing Christian men, then, I repeat it, is to make common cause against this common foe. We should be one and all ready to sink our differences, to put aside our prejudices, and so stand shoulder to shoulder in our efforts to keep this land Christian. If the men of other denominations are wise they will join with us in this struggle for reform, for if they do not the loss will be greater for them than for us. For while we, with the efforts we are making, will keep a very large proportion of our people, they will be completely abandoned by their own. Do not imagin that I am alone in entertaining this opinion. It has been acknowledged by some of the ablest and farthest-seeing men of the Protestant community. And not to go beyond the city of San Francisco for instance—the Rev. Dr. Platt, of Grace church, used the following remarkable words twelve years ago in connection with this affair: "As Protestants we should Christianize our education, because, first, if our secular schools were intended exclusivly to build up Protestantism, they are a great blunder, for they are breaking it down. . . . Secular schools in the interest of Protestantism are a fatal blunder. . . . As to Protestantism, it is only a question of time when our present system of public schools will render it a dead factor. The issue is by these schools, narrowing the controversy down to Romanism on the one hand and Infidelity on the other. . . . As American citizens we should Christianize our education."

These are remarkable words and deserve to be laid to heart and carefully studied by the entire Protestant community.

That is true, and it is so of every other such utterance by professed Protestants; for they are not Protestants, but Catholics. And such a system favored by any Protestant is a direct play into the hands of the Roman Catholic enemy of the American public school.

Theocracy.

Lecture at Chautauqua, N. Y., by Rev. Dr. Tiffany, of New York city.

I. According to the scripture, church and state are mutually separate and independent divine institutions. This has been true from the beginning. It was so in the Jewish economy. The Jewish church was not the state, nor was the state the church. Each had its distinct rulers, courts, laws, subjects, penalties, and duration. Moses, Joshua, David, Solomon, Hezekiah, and Zerubbabel represented the state; Aaron, Eleazar, Abiather, Zadok, Azariah, and Joshua represented the church. . . . The moral law is both a civil code and a spiritual law. In the former sense the state is the keeper, in the latter the church. It is the state's duty to suppress open idolatry, as Asa did in Judah. It is the church's privilege to enforce the worship of the true God. It belongs to the state to prohibit all public Sabbath desecration. It is obligatory upon the church to consecrate the day to God.

II. According to the scriptures, the state and its sphere exist for the sake of and to serve the interests of the church. Not to mention the fact that Christ is "head over all things to the church," it is expressly asserted, "kings shall be thy nursing fathers, and their queens thy nursing mothers;" "the nation and kingdom that will not serve thee shall perish; yea, those nations shall be utterly wasted;" "the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it." The general truth here taught is not far to seek. "Mountains" and "hills" in scripture signify the greater and smaller kingdoms of the earth. "The mountain of the Lord's house" means the church. And to "be established in the top" of the one and "exalted above" the other, indicates that the nations shall be the support and defense of the church. Kings becoming "nursing fathers" and queens "nursing mothers" refer to the sustaining care which nations shall exercise over the church, and "serve" signifies the ministry of the nations in providing for her material wants. The essential truth of these prophecies is, the true state will have a wise deference to the church's interests in its legislativ, executiv, and judicial proceedings. . . . In cases of emergency the expenses of the church in carrying on her public aggressiv work it meets in whole or in part out of the public treasury. Thus the church is protected and exalted by the state. David and Solomon made provision for the building of the temple, and Hiram, king of Tyre, assisted them. Cyrus, king of Persia, issued a decree respecting the rebuilding of the temple, and it is expressly declared that the Lord stirred up his heart to do it. Darius afterward issued an edict to the same effect. Another royal enactment was made by Artaxerxes to the same effect. And all this was done with the divine approval. "Blessed be the Lord God of our fathers, who hath put such a thing as this in the king's heart, to beautify the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem." The true state will follow their example in serving the interests of the church. "The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents; the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts;" "He shall liv and to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba;" "The gentiles shall come to thy light and kings to the brightness of thy rising;" "They shall bring gold and incense, and they shall show forth the praises of the Lord;" "Surely the isles shall wait for me and the ships of Tarshish first, to bring thy sons from far, their silver and their gold with them, unto the name of the Lord thy God, and to the holy one of Israel, because he hath glorified thee."

III. According to the scriptures, the church and the true state will exist in friendly recognition and coöperation. Because the state is distinct from the church, it does not follow that it is divorced from it. . . . The church will recognize the good offices of the Christian state, and the true state will formally acknowledge its obligation to "serve" the church. . . . Ever since Christianity became a power among the nations of the world, the mind of legislators has been occupied with the difficult question: Can church and state enter into mutual alliance and yet each prosecute, untrammeled, its respectiv ends; and exercise, uncontroled, its important function? Though the verdict of the Christian people of the United States, if called to-day to answer this question, would probably be overwhelmingly in the negativ, yet we conceive the pious, profound, and sagacious men of the second Reformation, more than two hundred years ago, solved the problem correctly, answering in the affirmativ. The National Reform Association seeks to hav this land thus in covenant with God, and in a state of friendly recognition and coöperation with the church of Christ.—Christian Statesman.

The Coming Morality.

From Charles Bradlaugh's National Reformer.

It is in the nature of ethical progress that our sympathies not only deepen but widen—that, as we emerge from egotism, the pains and pleasures of others are more and more nearly felt as our own, and that one class after another of our fellow-sentients, hitherto excluded from the range of sympathetic consideration, successivly claims admission within the range of fellowship. It is equally in the nature of things that this progress should be along the lines of kinship or similarity—that it should proceed from those most closely to those less closely allied in form and family relationship; for the start is from complete identity—egotism, which, as it widens, becomes an egoïsme à deux, à trois, à quatre, à plusieurs. Those who are most completely our fellows first come within the very narrow range of the primitiv conscience—those of our own sex and family before those of our family who differ from us in sex, our family before our clan, our clan before our nation, our nation before the division of the human race to which it belongs, that before mankind generally, man before the more humanized mammals, the latter before mammals in general, these before birds, birds before fishes, etc.

I do not say that, historically, the evolution of the scope of the moral sentiment has always kept exactly to this line. Other causes, secondary in importance to that which I am considering, hav interfered, and hav deflected that line sometimes in one direction and sometimes in another; but it will be found on examination of the general course of moral feeling, so far as its breadth is concerned, that the line of progress has taken the individual from himself to those more and more unlike or unrelated to himself. And this is as it should be; for the moral goal will be reached when every individual acts so as to promote the greatest happiness, without regard to who enjoys it—when every man loves his neighbor as himself and esteems as his "neighbors" all who can feel pleasure and pain. This is the only relevant fellowship from an ethical point of view. If we recognize degrees of fellowship, these should correspond to degrees of sensibility. Not the meanest animalcule who can feel a pang should be entirely shut out from our sympathies; but he would naturally occupy a very different place in them to that held by men and women, whose nature and culture make them acutely sensitiv to a great variety of pleasures and pains.

This Necessarily Produces Intolerance.

From the Western American.

Some people fancy that the Roman machine is liberal, has liberal views for Protestants, and is disposed to admit that occasionally one may get to heaven. To correct this mistake we refer readers to the following, which is taken from "Familiar Explanations of Christian Doctrin adapted to the family and more advanced students in Roman Catholic schools and colleges. With the approbation of the sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Kreuser Brothers, Baltimore, 1875:"

Question. Since the Roman Catholic church alone is the true church of Jesus Christ, can anyone who dies outside the church be saved?

Answer. He cannot.

Q. What do the fathers of the church say about the salvation of those who die out of the Roman Catholic church?

A. They all, without exception, pronounce them lost forever.

Q. Are there any other reasons to show that heretics and Protestants who die out of the true Roman Catholic church are not saved?

A. There are several. . . . They make a liar of Jesus Christ, of the Holy Ghost, and of the apostles.

Q. Now, do you think God the Father will admit into heaven those who make a liar of his son, Jesus Christ, of the Holy Ghost, and the apostles?

A. No. He will let them hav their portion with Lucifer in hell, who first rebelled against Christ, and who is the father of liars,

Faith Cure.

Our first-page illustration has as subject a recent occurrence at Findlay, Ohio. Bert Williams, twelve years old, while playing ball bruised his leg just below the knee. In a few days the limb gave him considerable pain, and a doctor was called who treated the injury and left the boy in good shape. Unfortunately for the boy, the faith cure people got hold of him and made him believe that if he had faith the Lord would perform a miracle by healing him at once. The stitches were removed and prayers begun. Young Williams was taken to the sanctuary at Bluffton, where no attention whatever was given him beyond prayer. Gangrene set in and the limb nearly rotted off. The smell from the decomposing member became so offensiv that he was removed to his home, where he died.

Cases like these are occurring thickly all over our Union. The spread of Rationalism is indeed needed and needed at once. Besides the lives lost, great harm is done by the exercise given to the uncontroled emotions whenever these faith cure people get together. This exercise of these emotions develops their organs, just as all exercise develops its organs, while the faculties of reason and control are disused and stunted.

But these occasional manifestations of insanity or folly are nothing in comparison with what were current before Freethought rose. Now only a few are thus crazy; then all were so. This is the way to get a good conception of what the world was like in the Middle Ages—conceive a world in which all were as these few are now. Those who hav not read the history of those times should do so. Otherwise they will be utterly unable to realize what Christianity really is when it is not kept diluted and half-hearted by the scoffings of Infidels scattered about thickly among believers. Otherwise they will be utterly unable to see why Freethinkers regard that religion with so much terror and so much horror and disgust. The world has been fairly insane until within two or three generations. Everywhere diseases were treated with mummeries, and physicians persecuted by jealous theologians as dealers in magic. It was dangerous to suggest that a cure for any malady could be found in a drug, or in anything but the superstitious ceremony or prayer by the vending of which the priest made his livelihood. Most thinkers kept their mouths shut; the fearless few who would speak were quickly led amid the hoots of the rabble to the rack and stake. There are histories and books of many kinds that set forth in all the blood-curdling details the condition of Europe during these Christian ages. After reading such books people can hav a full and realizing sense of the extent and the horror of these accursed supernatural beliefs and practices. After reading merely this bare statement that such existed, without all the circumstances and multitudinous particulars, they cannot comprehend the matter at all. They should get these books and read them. If people do not read these, they cannot understand why we make such a stir about the Christian doctrins today. They will fail to see how bound up with the Christian dogma are such practices, how inevitably they must attend its full and undoubting acceptance by a people, and how infallibly they will prevail again if Christianity is allowed to regain strength. The only reason such practices do not prevail everywhere now, is that the people's faith has been unconsciously shaken by the Infidel sentiments that all hav heard. The few Infidels scattered here and there are the salt of the nation. They are to-day the only thing that preserves it from destruction. Remove them, and the majority of the people, credulous and emotional, are just as ready to sink back into crazed and ferocious idolatry as they ever were. There is no difference between their cranial conformation and that of the barbarians who knelt to priests and massacred heretics seven or eight generations back. Take away the few men of sense, and they will act just the same. The only difference is, by ages of persistence through blood and fire, and aided finally by the printing-press and a conjunction of fortunate circumstances, Freethinkers hav got so they can spread their truths and shake a little the belief and resolution of the slavish flocks of the priests. To this, and to these few Freethinkers, we owe everything we hav to-day. People sometimes say that it is needless to make so much trouble about Christians now—that they would not do any harm now. They forget that the only thing that keeps these Christians half-sane now is the continual work upon them of these very Infidels. They imagin that without Freethinkers the Christians would act just as they do with Freethinkers. They confound two quite distinct things—on the one hand, a state containing Christians not having any Freethinkers interspersed through them, and on the other hand, a state containing Christians having Freethinkers interspersed through them. These are two very distinct things, and until we find that as a rule unlike causes work like results, we shall not find these two things, these two causes, working like results. With Freethinkers, only the extremely fanatical perform such acts as this of the Williams boy. Without Freethinkers, all Christians perform such acts.

Another point we wish to make clearly and distinctly understood is that all these faith cure follies hav for their logical foundation and sanction the explicit directions and commands of Christ himself. These practices are of the very essence of Christianity, and the so-called Christians of this age who condemn them are so grossly inconsistent that a child can see the self-contradiction. Any and every Christian that dares to utter a word of condemnation of them thereby condemns his own belief. He blasphemes. He contradicts Christ's clear and direct statements and commands. As the Catholics would put it, he "makes Christ a liar." Yet these men calling themselvs Christians continually do this. The Christian Advocate, the leading Methodist organ, prints the question from a subscriber: "What is 'faith cure,' and why is it generally apparently successful?" and answers it thus:

"'Faith cure,' in the common meaning of the term as used of the persons who are called faith curists, is a belief that God heals diseases, when a proper kind of faith is exercised, without medicin, and that medicin should be dispensed with; for he who takes it shows by doing so that he has not the kind of faith required. It is not 'generally apparently successful.' It is no more successful than Mormonism, Spiritualism, mind cure, Christian science, the Zouave Jacob, or some patent medicins."

How can this Christian editor, and other Christians, hav the hardihood to deny the efficacy of faith? What did their master teach on the subject, and what does their scripture aver in scores of passages? If one had faith as a mustard-seed, he was to move mountains. If one had faith, he was to handle poisonous serpents unharmed. Diseases are produced by unclean spirits, by devils, in people. These devils can be cast out by exorcisms of those full of the spirit. Christ cast out many such himself. "Receive thy sight, thy faith hath saved thee." "If any man is sick among you, let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord." "And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." "And, when he had called unto him his twelve disciples, he gave them power against unclean spirits to cast them out, and to heal all manner of sickness and all manner of disease." We want it understood that the whole of the insanities and follies that made the world a madhouse for centuries, and that now continually crop out everywhere as in the Findlay instance, flow directly and unavoidably from the book called the inspired scripture.

The Pope.

No doubt many would like to know just what is at the bottom of this matter of the continually proposed removal of the pope from Italy. What is at the bottom of it is this. The pope is intriguing with European powers to get them, in the next war, to grasp part of Italy, which he calls his temporal possession, and hand it over to him. And he wants to be out of Italy when the war breaks out against that country, because if he gets caught there in such an event the populace will unquestionably sack his palace and put him to death for his perfidy. To this main reason we may add a minor one, which is that the Italians are even now making it so hot for him and his black-petticoated slaves that he is afraid to stay there as it is.

The feeling against papistry in Italy is strong and growing. On July 13, 1882, the populace broke open the coffin of Pius IX., and were with difficulty restrained from throwing it into the Tiber. The priests in the streets are frequently hissed and jeered. Leo himself cannot walk or even ride about the city, because his "dear children" greet him with mud and filth. He is continually involved in dissensions with the government. Premier Crispi, it is said, has sent the officials of the Vatican private hints that the Italian government would not permit the papal treasure or Vatican art objects to leave Rome. It could not prevent the pope's personal departure, but the contents of the Vatican must remain. It seems that the government has some claim to these contents. Also Crispi has just published a document, dated June 9, 1848, in which Pius IX. relinquishes all claim to the temporal power, and as it is officially signed, authentic, and all that, the claims of Leo XIII. remain without validity. He is in a hole. Another indignity said to be done Mr. Pecci we will giv in the language of a papist journal, the Catholic Union and Times. Whether true or not, we cannot say:

"It is asserted by the Catholic journals in Rome that telegrams from ecclesiastics sent to the Vatican hav never been delivered. The subject of these telegrams was expressions of sympathy with the pope at the outrages done religion and indecency committed by the inauguration of the Giordano monument. The withholding of the telegrams has been discovered by the senders mailing the same words to the pontiff. If for a question so insignificant as that of Giordano Bruno the Italian government suppresses telegrams, what is it likely to do when greater interests are at stake? Day by day the feeling gathers strength that the pope must be free."

In resentment of all these "wrongs," the spiritual monarch has, the Venice Gazette reports, excommunicated King Humbert and Queen Margherita. The ordinary courtesies between the Quirinal and Vatican hav been suspended, and King Humbert's contribution of $10,000 to repair the old church at Naples has been returned.

The Bruno monument forms the last and worst of the "insults" to this God on earth. This Leo declares will not be borne. A brilliant move in regard to the Bruno matter is the artful procuring by the anti-Catholic party of a papal document giving a complete record of the trial by the Inquisition of Giordano Bruno. This record, together with the notes concerning the tortures to which he was subjected, and the manner in which he suffered death at the stake, was published by Professor Berti, who is King Humbert's minister of public instruction, on the very day on which the Bruno statue was dedicated. Its publication at such a moment was most disastrous to the Vatican; for a people so sensitiv and excitable as the Italians could not fail to be deeply moved by the relation of the horrible cruelties to which Bruno was subjected by the torturers of the Inquisition. Much distressed and disturbed by the loss of the documents in question, Leo XIII. has caused all of the most important of the archives of the Inquisition to be conveyed by night to the Vatican from the palazzo San Uffizio. But the holy father's action in the matter reminds one somewhat of the locking of the stable door after the theft of the nag. It was a remarkable oversight on his part to leave these papers among the archives of the Holy Inquisition at such an unguarded place as the palace San Uffizio. They were obtained through the aid of one of their guardians who has fallen off in faithfulness to his employer. It was along with the Bruno record that the document renouncing temporal possessions was also obtained.

Now, whether Leo will leave Rome, when he will leave, and where he will go, are questions whose answer can certainly be given by no outsider, and probably not by himself. It is a hazardous matter for him to leave, and he would not think of it were it not for the mortal fear in which he is continually kept while there. If he goes, he must either return as pope-king, or not at all. It is not to be supposed that, after the advance Italy has made, and her experience of the embarrassments his presence brings, she would ever consent to his return, even in case her rage should not be aroused by any intrigue on his part against her.

What a comment it is on the papacy when the very people among whom it has dwelt most intimately all the centuries are the ones whose detestation of it is the greatest of all people's! What a comment when the peoples who are farthest away are the only ones among whom its head can safely walk out in the streets, while he dare not show his nose to the populace who hav felt the effects of his system most and should know about it if anyone should!

Bruno.

The Bruno commotion continues. Protestant magazines and papers are full of articles on the life and martyrdom of that noble man. But it is noticeable that these Protestant periodicals never mention that it was the Freethinkers, the Infidels, that erected the monument. One would think it was the Protestants themselvs. They like to enjoy the fun when we giv their ancient Roman enemy a slap in the face for them, but they are afraid of shocking somebody by expressing a word of sympathy or admiration for the authors of the movement, or by even giving them mention and credit. Nevertheless, this is doing much good to the Protestants. The abounding dissertations upon the philosophy of Bruno, which was pantheism, are contributing to the spread of the true natural conception of the universe.

Among the Catholic outcries, we print this week one of the most notable, that of Cardinal Gibbons of Baltimore.

Another outcry is one issuing from the German Roman Catholic convention just held at Cleveland, Ohio. At this convention there were 700 delegates present, representing 439 organizations in twenty-six states, with 38,996 members. Protests were submitted by the Wisconsin and Illinois delegations against the laws recently passed in those states regarding parochial schools. And finally the convention adopted protests, submitted by the Milwaukee delegates, against the Bruno demonstration.

The New States.

On the 4th the New Mexico constitutional convention arranged most of its preliminaries. The event of the day was the election of a chaplain. For the first time in the history of constitutional conventions, a Protestant minister was pitted against a Catholic clergyman and the latter came off victorious, by a majority of ten votes. This is considered by many as a test vote on the strength of the public school question, which, without doubt, will be the most important one throughout the whole session.

The latest report from the Wyoming convention conveyed the shocking news that Mr. Chaplin had appalled the orthodox people by presenting a preamble without reference to the divine ruler. In submitting the paragraph the delegate questioned the jurisdiction of the deity over Wyoming.

Catholics Conquer.

During the last few weeks there hav been two school elections in New York state in which the issue was a religious one—at Rondout and Sing Sing. Catholics conquered in both. The disputes were over the religious views of the teachers. In one case the teachers whom the Romanists procured to be employed were Franciscan brothers, and the result is virtually the conversion of a public into a parochial school.

Where are the laws to keep these conspirators in check? Where are the Secular regulations? Where is the Secular spirit and intention of the fathers of our country carried out and realized? Where is the activity and devotion requisit to keep watch and defense in every locality? Where are the Protestants being converted to Freethought that they may oppose to the enemy the right sort of opposition—the only kind of opposition that will finally extirpate the Romish superstition? Where are the Freethought pamphlets and books and periodicals being distributed?

Slaves.

The publisher of the Catholic Telegraph in Cincinnati recently incurred the displeasure of his ecclesiastical superiors by comments on the utterances of the provincial council. Archbishop Elder sent him a formal retraction and apology to sign and publish in his paper, which he did with literalness, copying it verbatim as it was sent to him, as follows:

"As publisher of the Catholic Telegraph I hereby comply with the requirements of the above letter. I regret the appearance of the articles referred to. I retract (or if you choose—'disavow') all the injurious assertions and inferences contained in them, and I make the required promis, which I will keep loyally and honorably as long as I am connected with the paper. OWEN SMITH."

This is the way the Catholic machine works. Blind unquestioning obedience to official superiors is one of its most characteristic principles. What kind of citizens of a republic can men, or rather children, cherishing such principles, be? Even Protestants are better than this. If Catholics should be ordered to commit any treasonable act against Americans, they could but obey.

The Capital.

We wish to direct attention to the growing tendency of Christian organizations to select the capital city of this republic as their headquarters. To a person familiar with history, there is much in such a movement. Continually it has been the case that the neighborhood of the assembly of national lawmakers and administrators, to powerful bodies representing particular interests in the state, has resulted in the most tremendous events. The last instance was that at Paris in the French Revolution. When the seat of the American capital was discussed, George Washington was foremost in recommending that we be warned by the example of France and locate the capital not at a metropolis where the governing powers might be exposed to powerful influences or to mobs, but in the retired district where it now is. But now that the priests hav not got the capital to come to them, they are going to it.

In the first place, the great Catholic University has been seated there.

Second, the Methodists propose to follow suit. A correspondent of the Christian Advocate, writing from Washington, says that he has bsen for several years impressed with the conviction that the capital city is the place where the Methodist denomination should establish a national university, "in order to counteract the influences of the Romish church and to giv our common Methodism at the capital a power and influence hitherto unknown." He suggests that the founders purchase of the government from six hundred to nine hundred acres of the Lee estate on the south side of the Potomac, and lay it out in town lots, reserving enough for the use of the university to put the latter on its feet.

Third, the Journal and Messenger says one can not help thinking that he has in some way heard that the Baptists are inclined to locate in Washington a university which shall stand at the head, he says, of all such institutions in the country. It looks very much, the paper continues, as though the time for such an undertaking was drawing near.

We fear that Christianity is not going to go down without giving us some more trouble yet.

Editorial Notes.

VOLTAIRE the Deist said that if there were no God it would be necessary to invent one. Mr. Pentecost says he prefers Bakunin's remark: "If there is a God it will be necessary to annihilate him."

FREETHOUGHT is rising in Peru, we are happy to say. The Freethinkers and Freemasons of Lucia, in that country, hav started a Freethought paper called La Revista Masonica (The Masonic Review). It givs weekly an account of the doings of Freethinkers, and exposes the nefarious conduct of the clergy and bigots.

WE are to hav another statue to an eminent Freethinker of the past. Camille Desmoulins, familiar to students of the French Revolution, is the one to be honored. A statue to him is to be inaugurated at Guise by M. Yves Guyot, the French Freethinking minister of public works. Camille Desmoulins was the one who first incited to the taking of the Bastile on July 14, 1789. He was a thoroughgoing Freethinker. In his work on the Revolutions of France he stated that he considered Mohammedanism as credible as Christianity.

JEHOVAH has been visiting the south of Spain with a hurricane which destroyed the gardens around the Alhambra and damaged a number of church spires. No doubt, comments the London Freethinker, it's all the fault of those Spanish Infidels that are beginning to multiply so. They put the old gentleman upstairs into such a rage that he ruins his own property in quite a reckless fashion.

THE discussion of the proposed revision of the Presbyterian Confession of Faith is progressing. "Whether the Presbyterian church," says the Christian Advocate, "will continue to maintain the creed which has come down through centuries, or proceed to formulate another which shall more nearly express views of the truth now held by thinkers and teachers in that body, is one of the most important considerations which hav ever come before them." We should say so. We should say it is a pretty important matter whether or not these affirmations which hav always been held immutable and divine truths, and to force which on others Presbyterians hav at all times been ready to torture and slaughter the whole of mankind who would not accept them, are to be owned after all to hav been mistakes. When that which people hav been so sure in the past was true turns out false, we should think they would begin to question whether the whole thing that they hold now is not false, too.

IN Massachusetts they hav appointed as commissioner of education a religious bigot who will probably use his influence to get his particular superstition inculcated upon our school-children. The Boston Advertiser speaks thus:

"The appointment of Prof. W. T. Harris, of Concord, to be commissioner of education is one of those events over which all who care for what is highest and best can rejoice with unqualified joy. The relation between education and religion is so close that whatever concerns the former must hav direct bearing on the latter. Professor Harris's commanding abilities and high reputation were always exerted on the Hillside chapel platform at Concord in behalf of rational and reverent religious faith, as against Materialism and Agnosticism. No more potent words hav been spoken in recent times in defense of man's power and duty to know God than the words of this learned and brilliant metaphysician."

Mr. Harris is just the kind of a man we do not want. He will carefully exclude from the schools all text-books in which the advanced doctrins of science are even alluded to, and throw to the front all the elements of the old metaphysical and theological routine.

WE can giv our correspondent who wished for information on French Canadian immigration into New England, some further satisfaction, having obtained some late statistics. The foreign elements in the cities and towns are growing so rapidly that the nativ class is fast losing its preponderance, and, in some instances, is being altogether overshadowed. An article in the Forum givs some striking figures of this foreign invasion. The French Canadian element is noticeably large, and presents one peculiar problem in the fact that it carries the French language with it, and tenaciously adheres to it in the parochial schools. A recent school report in Manchester, N. H., states that out of 258 French children less than 5 per cent could read the simplest English words. The French Canadians in New England are said now to number half a million souls. In Manchester and Nashua, N. H., and Lowell, Mass., they constitute one-third of the population. In Fall River they hav increased in thirty years from one family to 20,000 persons. This is the percentage of illiteracy among the leading foreign nationalities that are crowding into Massachusetts: French Canadians, 51 per cent; Italians, 53; Portuguese, 69. This is putting a heavy task upon the assimilating and educating powers of the Old Commonwealth—too heavy, it is to be feared. It is said that crime is increasing there, which is to be expected in view of this influx of Catholics from the north and that of Irish Catholics from the opposit direction.

Lectures and Meetings.

W. F. JAMIESON was engaged, when last heard from, in delivering a course of five lectures in Hay Springs, Neb.

JULIET H. SEVERANCE, M.D., will answer calls to lecture anywhere on the route to Philadelphia, during the month of October, previous to the Congress. Parties should arrange at once.

JOHN PRESCOTT GUILD writes: "Please say to my friends that I am located in Springfield, Mass., and may be addressed at post-office box 554. Am ready to go anywhere and lecture for mental liberty and logical morals. A special address on 'The Flag We Float; or, The Unity of the American People,' I would call particular attention to, for the sentiment is one that should meet the unqualified approval of every citizen of this republic. Why should your correspondents cry about the scarcity of good lecturers when they fail to encourage or employ those who want to work at moderate pay?"

WE solicit all of our readers in the Northwest who can attend the convention of the Oregon state Secular Union to do so. It will be held at Portland, Ore., at Masonic Hall, on Saturday, Sunday, and Monday, October 12th, 13th, and 14th. It is aimed to hav the convention participated in not by Oregon Freethinkers alone, but by those of Washington also, and even, if possible, by those of all the new states. The object is to secure the total separation of church and state. Liberal orators and workers of every kind will be there. Surely the noble efforts just put forth by many Freethought veterans in the new states will induce in all a desire to meet and see those workers for us, and grasp their hands. Contributions, and communications of all kinds, will be received by the board of directors, C. Beal, A. F. Neunert, J. K. Sears, Lee Laughlin, L. Ames.

Letters from Friends.

NORFOLK, NEB., Sept. 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In your August 24th number is an article in which a good, sensible man is trying to giv the constitution-makers in North Dakota some good advice, and any man with good common sense will say that he was right. I also read the reply to it, and judging from the tune of that hypocrit who signs his name "Polonius," I should think that he ought to hav a chromo, as being the biggest fool in North Dakota. He is a hundred years behind the times.

Yours for truth and liberty, C. F. W. MARQUARDT.

ROSLYN, WASH., Aug. 30, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I note that you hav noticed the proceedings of the Washington constitutional convention, July 28th. I thought that some one would send you the proceedings of August 7th ahead of me, so I hav waited until now. It will be seen that to exempt the sky-pilots' cab is left to the legislature. When Mr. Powers moved that all persons whose annual income did not exceed $1,000 should be exempt from taxation he should hav got a leather medal, and his brain-splitting idea how to ascertain the income through the assessors must hav come from this side somewhere, for it could not hav come from above or below.

HENRY BEICHLING.

SAMOTH, ILL., Aug. 26, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: You will find inclosed herein $1 to pay for our stanch defender, the old TRUTH SEEKER. Our poor citizens contribute or squander their hard earnings for preacher purposes, leaving the people destitute almost of food and raiment, and as a consequence drain the pocket of the orthodox as well as the heterodox. There is in full blast in this vicinity a Baptist revival, tearing heaven asunder, erecting Gods in the pulpit. Such exertions as they make to secure converts are quite laughable. First they chant a few supposed paradise pieces of music; next upon their stupid, rheumatic knees make a supplication to a continually foiled omnipotence; then subsequently comes a reading of mythology from pens such as those of cranky Matthew, Mark, Luke, and the other crook; then a prolix discourse of nonsense. Yours for justice, C. D. MOBRIDE.

ADRIAN, MICH., Sept. 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: THE TRUTH SEEKER issues of August 31st and September 7th contain an article each from J. H. Wood, Mr. Scores, C. L. James, and myself. My critic seems to think we are not well up in financial history. He says as much as that the money basis outside of his formula is of no good, and the basis advocated by myself is unsound and silly, and intimates the script of Tom, Dick, and Harry is good enough. He refers to the days of wildcat money, and advises a closer study of the financial problem. It does not take a very profound financier to determin the fallacy of the mode of promis to pay and issuance the gentleman advocates. The one per cent interest he scoffs at and attempts to show its insignificance. It needs no criticism—anyone can understand it—that an attempt to run a government without a basis, on the Anarchist order, would be an indiscriminate tooth-and-nail fight. The wolf would eat the kid. He may hav a foundation to base his system upon. But he does not formulate a reasonable one. He says I hav in part indorsed him. I hav indorsed him in certain conclusions, but not his vagaries of finance and government. I will indorse him in all earnest endeavor toward the welfare of his fellow—no more. I do not censure anyone because of his non-concurrence with my views. I cannot accept his money basis or his theory of government. I assume no literary attainments, nor do I affect to be able to decide all those who do not agree with my attempts fools. The old Jew said, Truth is one, error is multifarious. One patriotic truth is of more satisfaction than all the fallacies in the calendar.

The discussion of the money and labor question will not prevent the Shylock priest or the fraud evangelist from robbing the superstitious devotee of their greed. Let the lovers of freedom of thought and hatred of coercion practiced by the church and priest use their energy and spare change to thwart the devilish methods to extort the means of livelihood from their dupes, and do all they can to force the human vipers, priests, to a recourse to other methods to make it possible to exist. The whole bent and aim of every true Liberal should be the extinguishment of the influence of these parasite leeches. Let government beware the insidious machinations of pope and church.

I will say to friend Wood, I feel competent to decide for myself the difference between a reality and a vagary. I presume Brother James is able to hoe his own row.

O. S. BARRETT.

KENTON, O., Sept. 3, 1889.

MY DEAR "POLONIUS:" I read your answer to "Saul" in No. 34 of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and am willing to stake my existence that you are a model Christian, judging by the language you made use of in speaking of Ingersoll and Paine. You admit that the people of the United States hav prospered notwithstanding the fact that God is not mentioned in the Constitution. But you say it is proof, if it means anything at all, not that a people will prosper because they ignore the supreme cause, but that God is just and does not visit the sins of the Constitution-makers upon the people. Now stop right there, "Po'onius," and tell us what you hav done with that God of yours who visits the sins of the parents on the children to the third and fourth generation. You ask, "Who is prepared to say, however, that the authors of this Constitution were not punished?" I will say none but a small-souled creature like you or your revengeful God could punish the men who gave free and happy homes to sixty millions of people. You ask, "Can 'Saul' assure us that the scoffing Infidel of the last century is not suffering the pangs of the lost in the place of eternal punishment?" Can you answer that question yourself? Would you say they are in torment, or would you be honest enough to say, I do not know? You ask, "Who can say but that the terrible war that swept over the country was not in part a punishment for the sin of our national Constitution?" I believe the war was a punishment for the mistake our ancestors made when they incorporated that grand Bible doctrin of human slavery in the Constitution. In winding up your discourse you say, "All churches will agree in the one fundamental truth that we are indebted to God for our well-being." Now, why not tell it just as it is and say all churches are indebted to the dupes who furnish the money to build them, and keep the priests and preachers in idleness? And what do you mean by saying "all churches?" You know there is only one true church, and you certainly belong to it. If you do not, how much better are you than the Infidel? "If the scoffer and Infidel don't like to liv in God's country, let them remove to some other country." There you hav the bull by the tail again, "Polonius." Don't you remember this is not God's country? His name is not mentioned in the title-deed, which is the Constitution. You hav proved to my entire satisfaction by your writing that you are out of your element, and had better emigrate to God's country as soon as convenient.

GEORGE BAKER.

PORT ANGELES, WASH., Aug. 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In your editorial of August 11th, speaking in regard to "God"—or, as D. M. Bennett would hav written it, god—in the constitution, you labor under the impression that his royal highness is left, where he should hav been, out. But alas! you are mistaken. The section adopted reads as follows:

> We, the people of the state of Washington, grateful to the supreme ruler of the universe for our liberties, do ordain this constitution.

The Seattle Post-Intelligencer has the following:

> A long and somewhat tedious debate ensued over the preamble, from which mention of the deity had been purposely omitted. The wrangle over the question lasted for two days, and it finally ended in the complete rout of the heretics, and the triumph of the hosts of the Lord.

Yes, we ought to be grateful to the supreme ruler of the universe for our liberty, especially the female portion of the citizens of the state. Witness the insult offered us when the electiv right is acted upon. "All male persons of twenty-one years or over possessing certain qualifications shall be entitled to vote." The motion to strike out the word male overwhelmingly lost. "Idiots, insane persons, and persons convicted of infamous crimes, are excluded from the electiv franchise." There you hav us in a nutshell. Either we are not citizens, or persons, or we must belong to the class of idiots, insane, or infamously criminal.

The Post in one of its exceedingly brilliant editorial squibs says:

> The North Dakota constitutional convention has decided to giv to the legislature power to grant women suffrage. No such mistake will be made here, where the people hav seen the sentiment of the territory on this question twice outraged by legislativ bodies.

The Post-Intelligencer is a pretty good paper to publish the Associated Press news, but its veracity on questions of the day is about as trustworthy as the ordinary Christian's. It always tells the truth if the truth suits its own interests. Twice hav legislativ bodies in this territory enacted suffrage laws for women by the demand of their constituents, and agreeable to the platform of principles upon which they were elected, and twice hav they been declared void by the decision of carpetbagger supreme judges on a mere technicality of the law. It is enough to make one's blood boil. I wish I were a person of eloquence of speech, I would move a rebellion. I would urge the women of the territory to refuse to pay any further taxes on property. I would ask them to refuse to celebrate the glorious Fourth of July. I would devise ways and means to prove that we are actually persons, that we are citizens, and not mere property, or idiots or insane creatures. In my very humble capacity as an idiot, I will say I consider the proposed constitution a very learned (?) and extremely wise (?) and cumbersome document, and sincerely hope it will be voted down. LAURA E. PETERS.

PORTSMOUTH, O., Sept. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: There is a movement on foot to hav a Freethought lecture in this city. Such a discourse was never known to Portsmouth. The nearest the people here hav ever came to hearing such talk was in 1876. The occasion was a large political gathering, and Col. Robert G. Ingersoll was the speaker of the day. He spoke in the Music Hall, and the old place was packed. I was at that time quite a boy, yet I well remember the gathering, and the incidents connected therewith. The colonel told the plain truth about the Democrats before, during, and after the war, and also haranged the church, and pictured her as she was on the slavery question. I shall never forget it. It was more than the old deacons and the amen-corner brethren could stand. They were a sad few, and they got up and departed. Their going, however, only aided the cause, and the increased majority in Scioto county that year showed they were a good riddance. Robert Spry (deceased) was then county prosecutor. He was a bitter Democrat, but still he went round to hear the jovial Ingersoll. He took a seat beside a Republican friend. The colonel, every once in a while, would strike heated blows, fast and furious, at the Democratic party, and Spry would raise up as if to go, at the same time saying, "Damn him." No sooner had the cuss word fallen from his lips, than Ingersoll would crack a joke. Spry would smile and hesitate about leaving. Then the great Agnostic would burst forth in eloquence unequaled, and Spry would sit down and say, "Ain't he eloquent? ain't he grand?"

Said an old Liberal, "I am a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and hav never failed to find it both entertaining and instructiv. And I hav noticed with regret that so few letters are written by ladies. When I read a nice, long letter written by a Freethinker's wife, praising the brave soldiers of liberty's army, I imagin that the time is only a short way off when the demons of heaven will be dethroned and happiness and love shall rule the earth and sky." It is true that few ladies write letters for publication in Freethought papers. This is not because they are afraid or lazy. The reason is they are a little slow. Letters from them would do a power of good, and would greatly assist in the hastening of that day when reason will be crowned the god of gods, and when every star will twinkle with delight. It will be ushered in with music and song. Every man, woman, and child will be free, and to each other will say:

> Hark, the music of this morning
> From the silvery throats of bells.

CLEVELAND, O., Sept. 2, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose you a clipping from the Evening Press of this city, thinking it might be of some interest to you, for it clearly shows how some people would like things to be. The parade itself was a strange amalgamation of fanatics and foreigners, mostly both. Their receding foreheads, in combination with lumped topknots, showed how abnormally the bumps of reverence were developed.

I am a constant reader of all the Freethought papers, but like yours best, as it contains the most reading matter, and would hav long since become a subscriber but for the fact that "I am a commercial tourist."

I sometimes think that all papers whose aim is reform are too radical, and that if they would not use ridicule, but more argument, it would be possible to create a reform. For when ridicule is used—and especially by those who are not skilled in its use—it almost stops a sensitiv person from further investigation for fear of more abuse, but argument offends no man. In my travels I find at least eighty per cent of the people with whom I do business are skeptical, but to ridicule either them or their ideas only shuts their ears against further conviction.

Why does not some Freethinker take the alleged holy Bible, eradicate its objectionable features, retouch the moral points, and publish it? W. C. J.

Card to the Public: The Methodist preachers' meeting of Cleveland, O., with an attendance of twenty-six members, representing a Methodist population of more than twenty thousand, has learned with great sorrow and just indignation of the wholesale desecration of the Sabbath in this city on September 1st, under the guise of religion as represented by the convention of the German Roman Catholic societies of the United States. This society, by its public parade, led by numerous brass bands, disturbed, in violation of law, the order of the city and the sanctity of the day. We most earnestly protest against societies, in the name of religion or otherwise, coming to this city from all over the Union and defiantly overriding our Sabbath laws. But what is more shameful and humiliating than this is, that the city officials, who hav been elected to maintain law and order, should so far forget and ignore their sacred oaths and obligations as to take part in this desecration by publicly reviewing it, and even by an authorized representativ of the mayor giving it public sanction, as was done by the utterance of Mr. McNairy. We also protest against the police of the city, which is supported by a common tax, being used as an escort for any society on the Lord's day, as was done on this occasion. And we most earnestly call upon these lawbreaking authorities to enforce the law against the scores of saloonkeepers who defiantly keep their places open on this day. We also earnestly invite all the Protestant churches of this city to unite with us in this protest. And furthermore, we advise all our people to see to it that all officers of the city who in any way giv countenance to such desecration be held to a strict accountability at the ballot-box.

POCAHONTAS, ILL., Sept. 1, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Let me speak to David Lockhart on his answer to Converse Close. Mr. Lockhart accuses Mr. Close of taking a one sided view of the teachings of the Bible. I wonder how many-sided a view he takes. He quotes from the Bible, "He who runs may read, and the wayfaring man, though a fool, shall not err therein," and goes on to tell us the facts of the case are that people are too ignorant or, for lack of time, too indifferent to study it. Were Wesley, Calvin, Luther, ignorant or indifferent? Are the hundreds of students of Greek, Latin, and Hebrew ignorant or indifferent? Or will Mr. Lockhart insist that all these leaders and distinguished men are even worse than fools? I say, Yes—because they were knaves. The gentleman avers that no man in his senses would affirm that the gospel now preached is the same as was taught by Jesus and his apostles eighteen hundred years ago, and yet we hav millions who do affirm it, and they are not capable of seeing the difference—i. e., hav no sense and are fit for some infirmary. Here Mr. Lockhart denounces millions as not being capable of perceiving the difference between the gospel now taught and that taught eighteen hundred years ago. I think the trouble is in Mr. Lockhart. He cannot see that although the Bible is so plain that the fool may not err therein, the fool has said in his heart there is no God. And Paul says, without controversy, "Great is the ministry of godliness." And Peter declares that there are therein many things hard to be understood. The gentleman speaks of the disciples in the first century having all things common. He cannot see that the master of the lodge unwittingly broke into his and his antecedents' plans by having Ananias and his wife murdered at his feet. Christ taught that his disciples were all brethren, but experience has taught us all that Communism is only a visionary scheme for the improvident to liv off of the industry of others, and a corrupt tree cannot bear good fruit. Honesty is the first principle of religion, says Mr. Lockhart, and when the teachers of theology become honest they will leave their superstitions and turn to the Bible, etc. But I would say, Turn from the Bible. For if they believe in the promises made to Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, David, Solomon, Jesus Christ, Paul, and the rest of the apostles, they will soon find how true it is that he who runs cannot read, and it is difficult not to err therein. For the remainder of Mr. Lockhart's letter I hav nothing but commendation. I believe him to be an honest man, but I think he is yet blinded as to the origin and tendencies of the Bible, and if he desires any further discussion on the utility of the old book I stand open to all for conviction. I believe that the Bible has more of fable than truth, more of the immoral than of the moral, and that it is the groundwork of almost all the superstition in our nation.

It appears to me that had people in any age of the history of man undertaken to do all they could to compile a book of contrariety, immorality, and fiendishness they could not hav exceeded the Bible, leaving unbiased men to judge.

Ex-Rev. Joseph Maxey.

Eau Claire, Wis., Sept. 2, 1889.

Mr. Editor: Mr. J. H. Wood may hav his own financial theory straight, though I hav all along confessed my inability to make out what it is, but he certainly does not understand other people's. He says the mutual bank paper is the same as that which from 1830 to 1860 was called wildcat, yet I think he can hardly deny that there is a pretty serious difference when the wildcat banks professed to redeem in specie, while the idea of mutual paper is to redeem in value. He says the trouble with the wildcat paper is that it was a fraud. I think so, too; but why was it a fraud? A fraud is a false pretense. The wildcat banks pretended that they would redeem on demand in specie, which they could not do, and that was just where the fraud came in. The Anarchistic idea of mutual banking is that the bank's paper shall be good for any commodity within the circle of its exchanges, which could be made to include everything. It would then fulfil all the functions of coin, and a pledge to redeem specifically in coin at sight would neither be given nor required. The expenses of mutual banking would not be paid from interest, but, being reduced to a minimum, would come out of mere clerical fees. But of what else is the expense of printing greenbacks to come? As to Mr. Wood's assertion that government paper never depreciates, I should like to know what he calls it when $1 in gold would fetch $2 50 in greenbacks, as in July, 1863. The high price of all commodities in greenbacks at the same time showed that it was not gold which had risen in value, but greenbacks which had fallen. The value of greenbacks did not depend at all on governmental fiat, but on the probability that they would be redeemed. Hence, when it seemed doubtful if the government ever could redeem them, down they went, and when it began to redeem them, up they came. The probability of their being redeemed necessarily depended very much upon the volume issued. Mr. Wood has certainly pushed the greenback doctrin to its reductio ad absurdum when he says that the want of money is the only cause of poverty and all its attendant evils. Midas, according to the classic fable, received the gift of turning all he touched to gold. There was no want of money there. But Midas was poorer than any beggar, for his fatal gift would not let him hav even a cup of water to drink. If we all had the power to turn whatever we touched to greenbacks, we should all be just as poor as Midas. Want of wealth is the cause of poverty, or rather is poverty itself. Money, in the abstract, is only a medium for the transfer of wealth, very conduciv to its production certainly, but not the thing itself at all. Its power of representing wealth depends on its being capable of conversion into wealth, and is limited by the amount of wealth in the world. A factitious limitation of the circulating medium, as where only chartered banks are permitted to issue it, is bad for trade. But a factitious increase, beyond the volume of wealth which can be exchanged for it, is equally so. The mutual banks, being emporia for the exchange of all wealth, and limiting their issue to a proportion, sufficient for insurance against losses, of the wealth received, propose a natural method of raising the volume of currency to the redeemable maximum, free from the experiments of political demagogs, who hav nothing to lose by the failure of a governmental financial scheme, and no better means than anyone else of telling whether it could succeed or not.

C. L. James.

Newcomb, Tenn., Sept. 8, 1889.

Mr. Editor: I hav sat down to giv my first letter from this place, and probably the first The Truth Seeker ever received from here.

I hav not been able to make the acquaintance of any Freethinkers here or learn of any in the community. This is a mining village, with a surrounding population of four or five hundred, and the village has four or five churches. The colored people hav a church to themselvs. Although the white Christian and the black all expect to occupy the same heaven in the sweet by and by, yet they cannot well occupy the same church here. This part of the country may, I suppose, be properly called the New South, not because of its recent discovery, but because of the new industries springing up of late years. In traveling through the country I hav noticed that every little group of houses has a church in its midst. I hav even noticed that where there would be only five or six houses. And yet the want of morality in this country is a general reproach to it. I went to church last Sunday, and among the many things the preacher said was this truth: "I would compare the influence of professed Christianity on the community to a poisonous stagnant pool." I thought the comparison was an excellent one, and yet if an Infidel speaker had made such a remark he probably would hav been stoned out of the community, or to death, for you know the more ignorant and vicious a people become the more intolerant they are. The negroes here, as almost everywhere, are great churchgoing people, and I often remark, the more ignorant the people the more devoted they are. At Jellico, a little village of six or seven hundred people, the church employed a minister last winter to go down to Nashville, the state capital, to get the town corporation annulled. By so doing these church people claimed the sale of whisky would be stopped and the good morals they so much desired would be restored. The report said they gave their lobbyist $1,000. He stayed quite a while at the capital, but was of no avail. The rum fiend, after all their money spent and prayers sent up to God, still holds the fort.

Another thing I see in the New South is the great monopoly of land. Men are everywhere learning the power they gain by getting the command of the earth's surface. The larger owners are constantly crowding out the lesser ones. And yet there are millions of acres of idle land, while the people are half the time idle and half-starving. As proof is needless on these points, I will not giv it. Talk of the evil influences and effects of the negro slavery of the past—for my part, I cannot see where there is very much difference between it and the present industrial slave system of to-day. True, the slave of to-day is not whipped with the lash, nor sold from his family. But he is permitted to sit with them in a kind of den, and see them half-clothed, half-fed, and not educated at all. We talk about the reformation of government—how can we reform until we know how? Information must come before reformation, and we cannot educate without the means, and we cannot get the means until we can employ ourselvs at wages that will giv us more than a bare living.

I am satisfied that the doctrins of free land, and the single tax, are not popular with the landowners, and probably may not be with the Editor of The Truth Seeker. I do not know as to that, but I noticed in one of the issues of The Truth Seeker where the Editor spoke of Mr. Pentecost's reform as one in which he, the Editor, did not take any part. Notwithstanding the opposition the single-tax doctrin has to combat with, you will find men in every village and hamlet in this country who hav some kind of a theory or idea of how the evils of land monopoly ought to be abolished. Although the Editor of The Truth Seeker may oppose the doctrin, I hope he will be true enough to the title of his paper to hear and allow good articles on this subject space once in a while. For how can we get at fact on any subject without investigation? There is undoubtedly a cause for the shameful poverty and suffering of the poor in the United States. To say we are better in circumstances than other countries does not mitigate the case. Then let us investigate, and if we should arrive at conclusions that are not at first popular, bear our burdens like the heroes of time past. I am a poor man, and know my Infidelity, or rather my disbelief in the Bible, has brought down upon my head the disapprobation of influential Christians, who used their influence against me to my financial detriment. And my wife said to me, "If I were you, when we get away from home where we are not known, I would not talk so much Infidelity. It does not do you any good, but really harms you." I said, "What I think is truth I will never disdain to own." Then let Christians do their worst. Some one must be now and then sacrificed at the shrine of Truth and Liberty.

Purdy's Station, N. Y., Aug. 30, 289

To Helen H. Gardener, Dear Sister: Though a stranger to you, I still take the liberty of calling you sister, and I wish to express my gratitude for your story, "The Lady of the Club," recently published in Belford's Magazine, and republished in The Truth Seeker of July 20th. I hav read with pleasure and profit all your works, especially your essay on "Sex in Brain," which made me almost feel proud of you, but your late production, in my opinion, takes the palm. I hav not read anything of late that impressed me so much as "The Lady of the Club." It is impossible to read it without dropping a tear of pity for the poor woman who died of "the brutality and selfishness of man—and poverty with love." And when we take into consideration that she is only one of a great many, your story becomes a tragedy not of one individual only, but of the whole suffering humanity. You hav raised a question which, perhaps, has been on the tongues of many, but very seldom asked. Of what use are the finely spoken words about love and poverty, as if they are a blessed combination, when as a matter of fact the latter says to the former, "The more you love, the more you will suffer?" The greater the affection, the greater is the care, and how great must be the sufferings of a man who knows that the woman, who loves him with all her heart and for whom he is willing to giv his life, is in actual want! "What does it matter for one's self?" asks the Lady of the Club. "It is love that givs the awful sting to want." The same question troubled Loponkhoff, one of the heroes of Tchernychewsky's romance, "What Is To Be Done?" when he was about to marry Vera Pavlovna. "Boots, an overcoat, not out at the elbows, stcki on the table, my room warmed—what else do I need? Now all that I shall hav. But for a young and pretty woman that is not enough." Here lies the whole secret. It is, indeed, very painful to think that the one you love the best livs in a miserable hut, is clad in rags and fed on a crust. No man to whom love is not a meaningless word can stand it.

Love! What a beautiful and charming word it is! It is the fairest flower in the world, the grandest thing in nature. But as this word is often misunderstood, let us see what is the real origin of love. A true and kind man loves a deserving woman. Surely he does not love her because he is kind. At least, such is my conviction. Love, as a result of mere kindness, is charity. No brave and honest woman will accept it. Vera Pavlona had almost infinit esteem for her husband, but a thought struck her that he caressed her not because that givs pleasure to him, but because he is good.

"No, don't embrace me, my dear friend! That is enough. I thank you."

And she givs him a glance so soft and so sincere.

"I thank you; you are so good to me."

"Good, Verotchka? What do you mean?"

"Good, yes, my dear friend, you are good."

Why did the word good so startle Loponkhoff? It is because he knows that real love has nothing to do with goodness. When a noble woman thinks that her husband cares so much for her simply because he is good, her nature rebels against it; she regards it as a degradation of her dignity. No matter how attentiv he may be to her, the real harmony is broken, and it is almost impossible to restore it.

The foundation of real love is egoism. You love a woman not for her sake, but for your own sake. Her love givs pleasure to you, it makes your own life sweeter, it adds to the sum of your happiness. To say that you love her for her own sake exclusivly is to make a great mistake. Such a love is, to say the least, an illusion. You may love her so with your mind, but not with your heart. The impulses of the heart hav no other motivs but your own happiness or suffering. This is egoism, to be sure, but it should terrify no one. An egoism of this kind will not ruin the world. On the contrary, it is the parent of all virtues and good deeds. It seems to me that it cannot be otherwise. When your love to a woman is of the real kind, you want to make her happy, you want to see her face radiant with joy. And why? Because her happiness will make you happy. The simple thought that she needs something which you cannot giv her is enough to fill your heart with grief, and here the problem of love and poverty begins. Love is the cause of your suffering. The pale face of your beloved, her "unfed sides, her looped and windowed raggedness," make you infinitly miserable. Now let us ask, What is the remedy? Has poverty no right to love at all? Should love dwell only in palaces? Should the poor man spend a lonely life, because he cannot furnish his sweetheart with the comforts he desires to giv her? If so, of what value is life? What is life without love? Love, as I hav said before, givs happiness and makes life worth living. A great man, who works for humanity, never livs in vain, no matter what his private life might be. But great men are rare, and the average man can not liv and suffer for others. He must hav a little sunshine. There must be something which should attach him to life, which should beautify nature itself, as it is of very little use to talk about the beauty of nature to a man who is a stranger to happiness and has to work all day to maintain his existence. Can a life without love, without happiness, be called a success? Can anything be more terrible then the thought, that one has to kill the noblest passions of his heart on account of poverty? Picture a young man with a loving heart, one who knows what constitutes real happiness. He works as a farm hand from twelve to fourteen hours a day, and yet, for some reasons, can save but very little money during the year. He does not expect to hav a home of his own, at least for a great many years yet to come. What should he do? Should he say to himself: "My dear friend, it is not good for a man to be alone. You should hav one to help you bear the burden of life?" He would rather commit suicide than to hav a woman share his poverty. He avoids women. He is afraid of their society. Why? He knows that acquaintance may lead to love, and love will lead to suffering. Afraid to love! Is not that rather strange? Nevertheless, it is a sad fact. He knows that love will make him unspeakably miserable, and he does not want to suffer any more than he can help, and, what is still worse, to cause suffering to the woman that may love him.

Colonel Ingersoll once said that a young man, instead of getting in love with God, should get in love with some lovely girl. But so far as the person in question is concerned, he prefers the former. Love to an imaginary god, if any such thing could ever happen, might make a maniac of him. That would be the worst of it. But no one's heart would ache, no one would suffer. But nature deliver him from getting in love with some good, sweet girl! He cannot imagin any torture more painful than that, and it would be equal only to the sufferings of the lost in a Christian hell.

Speaking of love, Heinrich Heine says: "In the realm of love there are, so to say, temporary furnaces, where we are destined to get roasted for a while, before we reach the real hell. Hell? Is it proper to speak of hell in a case of love? Well, then, if you please, I will compare it also with heaven. Unhappily, it is impossible to define with certainty, whether love resembles hell or heaven the most. It is also difficult to tell whether those heavenly spirits, which meet us there, are disguised devils, or those devils are disguised heavenly spirits."

You may or may not agree with Heine. But of one thing I am certain—love in the heart of the poor and needy is a real hell. You meet "heavenly spirits" there, and to their sweet words you listen with rapture. But in reality they are disguised devils or sirens who charm your ear and then ruin your life. To use the language of the Lady of the Club, "Love and poverty! It is a combination that devils invented to make a hell on earth."

Now, the question rises, Is there any remedy? Is there any help for the living? After the funeral of Frank Melville and his wife, Barker said, "Is this the solution?" and left the question unanswered. Is there one with genius enough to answer it, or is there no answer at all? Shall we say with Heine:

> The waves murmur their eternal murmurs,
> The winds blow, the clouds flow fast,
> Cold and indifferent twinkle the stars,
> And a fool awaits an answer.

How long will the dark night last? Shall we never see the bright day?

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Our Children.

I looked at the happy children
Who gathered around the hearth;
So blithe they were—no children
Could be happier on earth:
With their merry plays, and their winsome ways,
And the sound of their silvery mirth.

Then I thought of those other children,
So wizened, and hard, and bold,
Who huddle in slum and cellar,
And shiver with want and cold;
Not fresh as the dew, or the morning hue,
But haggard, and lean, and old.

But yet may they still, those children,
Be taught to forget their pain;
And gathered in arms that love them,
Their laughter may come again;
And the stare of woe and the craft may go,
And the spirit be washed of stain.

But it is not in cold book learning
Those children's hearts to move;
And the stony eye of the serpent
Is death to the stricken dove;
'Tis an angel alone can touch them,
And that angel's name is love.

For whatever the world may fancy,
And whatever the wise men say
Of our nineteenth century progress,
Of a new and better way,
Still it takes a heart to make a heart
Now, as in the olden day. —The Spectator.

Little Susie.

Little Susie's full of fun;
She is only three times one;
Full of sunshine and delight—
Little laughter-loving sprite!

Every morn she hurries out
To the barn, and round about,
Full of eager, hopeful joy,
'Cause she's "Papa's little boy!"

Then into the house she comes,
Wipes the dishes, sweeps the crumbs;
Always in a busy whirl,
'Cause she's "Mamma's little girl!"

When she wants to take a nap
Up she climbs in grandma's lap,
Giving kisses without measure,
'Cause she's "g'an'ma's p'ecious tweasure!"

Like a sunbeam from above,
Susie scatters light and love;
And the darling knows not yet
Why she's everybody's pet.

Reptil Culture.

For the further edification of the children of the TRUTH SEEKER family, I will say that the proprietors of the frog farm mentioned in THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 31st hav added another reptil industry to their business—that of growing turtles (tortoise)—not really propagating them, but they buy all the "soup turtles" (soft shells) offered them at three cents a pound, many of which are quite small and are housed in a large box for the purpose of growth, and kept in the water at the edge of the dam that supplies the frog-ponds. They are then fed the swill and offal from the hotel tables, on which, like little pigs, they "liv and grow fat," until of large size and ready for market; then they are sold for soup-making. Together with the little yellow unlaid eggs and the "seven kinds of meat" that they are said to possess, they are said to make a dish fit for a king. Just as if a king was better than his subjects! The turtles soon learn to know Johnny, their attendant, who feeds them regularly every day. There is not a Catholic among them, as they are no respecters of days or creeds, and never refuse to eat meat on Friday or a good meal on Sunday, and I presume would like to take a day off occasionally and visit froggies' quarters and feast upon Mr. Frog Sullivan's delicate white meat. But they are kept secure in their prison of boards and all appear contented and happy. We hav a worthless species of turtle here known as the box turtle, which is about 4x6 inches across the shell—a nice spotted little reptil and quite a plaything for the dogs, who delight in carrying them around in their mouths. But little Boxie is free from harm, as he always goes into his house and shuts the door, drawing in head, tail, claws, and nails, and thus bids defiance to all outsiders, as their shells are toothproof.

We hav still another reptil not found in all places known as night crawlers, a monster species of angleworm, which is never found except at night, when it comes to the surface of the ground and is caught by boy experts, who use a torchlight to find them, but who must be very agil, as night crawlers are exceedingly quick to enter their holes. And while they hav no eyes they hav a quick instinct that tells them of the approach of an enemy. They are from six to ten inches in length, and when caught are sold to the boat liverymen, who keep boats and fishing tackle for rent at five cents per dozen, and are resold to fishermen for bait at ten cents per dozen, thereby making a profit of one hundred per cent. Poor little night crawlers are thus sacrificed to please man, and are caught at night when on duty trying to get a living, and like many men and naughty boys who try the same game, if caught, must receive punishment for so doing.

In my next letter I will describe the sturgeon fishery at this place, and show how the mammoth fish, much larger than little boys and girls, are caught, and made to supply the shekels of man. A. D. SWAN.

Brownie's Adventure.

A STORY FOR THE LITTLE FOLKS.

Brownie is a cat. She had five kittens. Three were drowned, but the other two were permitted to liv on account of their beauty.

They were exactly of the same pattern, their backs clothed with fine yellow fur coats. Their eyes were blue, feet and legs pure white. When they were only two weeks old Brownie suddenly disappeared. Her friends thought she must hav been poisoned, for, voluntarily, they knew she would not desert her family in that way.

Thus left, the kittens had to be brought up by hand. One of them fell into the care of a young lady who named her little pet, Buffy. The other was called Dixie, and was cared for by Brownie's mistress. The stepmothers endeavored to feed the kitties by means of milk in bottles with rubber tubes. This method was not successful. Then feeding them with a teaspoon was tried. This was better, and they looked very cunning taking their meals with a tiny white napkin pinned around their little necks. They would shut their eyes tightly and smack their lips as they sipped the warm milk, but it was some trouble to attend to them, as they took their meals very often and only a little at a time.

When about four weeks old, one night as the door stood open, who should walk in but the missing Brownie in quite an exhausted condition? She lifted her back to the prescribed angle, and immediately began her story.

"My dear friends," said she, rubbing her back against her mistress, "I know you hav been anxious about me, and would like to know why I hav been so long from my children.

"It was the 10th of July, when I was gleefully romping on our lawn, when a tall, black-whiskered bandit of a man who was passing, snatched me, and taking me to his wagon, unceremoniously thrust me into a coarse meal-bag, and tied me in with a string. I thought I should suffocate with indignation and from want of air.

"They say a cat has nine lives, but it seemed to me that I had ninety-nine, and that I died once for every one, I was in such agony. We rode many miles, and at last reached a farm-house. The bandit took me from the bag, carried me panting and kicking into the house, and handed me to his wife. 'Here, wifey,' said he, 'I told you I'd bring you something from the city. Isn't she a beauty?'

"'O you thief,' I ejaculated, 'you stole me!' And I flew at the old robber, spat upon him, and scratched him. His wife said I was scared and that made me do it. But I was not scared. I was mad at such inhuman treatment, so much beneath a cat of my bringing up. They gave me some new milk, and then they put me in the woodshed and locked the door—I that never had a key turned on me in all my life! In that dismal hole along with rats and mice they kept me until now.

"Early this morning they went away in haste, and forgot to lock me in.

"'Now is my time,' said I, and before the carriage was out of sight my feet were on the doorsill, and I started for my dear home. I should think I hav traveled forty miles, I am so weary. You ask how I knew the way. I knew it by that fine sense that we cats possess over you humans, and we can find our way anywhere in the darkest night that ever was.

"While on my way home I overheard two men talking about the appointment of an agent in this town for the prevention of cruelty to animals. I was proud to hear that, for I assure you that dumb animals, as you call them, hav feelings the same as folks.

"How often hav you seen horses abused, beaten, and driven unmercifully by their cruel and unfeeling masters, who are more beastly and brutal than the creatures in their charge.

"I think people who thus misuse dumb animals are the meanest and most contemptible beings on the face of the earth.

"I perceive my children hav received good care in my enforced absence, although they do not now seem to recognize me. I thank you for caring for them so tenderly, and I will endeavor to bring them up properly. I will teach them not to steal or play the hypocrit, and to keep their homes free from vermin."

Brownie caressed Buffy and Dixie, and declared forcibly in cat language that "there is no place like home." MIRIAM.

A Few Passing Thoughts.

Virtue is the true foundation of all happiness, honor, and glory.

Love and happiness are the charms of the household.

The best way to gain fortune is to be industrious and self-reliant.

Freethought and science are the thunderbolts that are shaking the very foundation of dogmatic theology.

If we make truth and reason our guides, we cannot fail to succeed.

I long to see the day when the chains are broken from the limbs of Universal Mental Liberty; when truth, justice, and reason are placed on their throne, and the brow of science crowned with a wreath of everlasting glory.

The day is dawning when all the world will throw off the shackles of theology and step proudly out into the sunlight of truth and Universal Mental Liberty.

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

Flossie: "Mamma, can I giv one of my dolls to Cicely Waffles?" Mother: "Certainly not, Flossie. Why do you want to?" Flossie: "I find that twins are too great a charge."

Little Fanny looked intently at her mother for some time. Then she said: "Mother, you ain't a girl, are you?" "No, Fanny." "What are you?" "I am a woman." "You were a girl once, weren't you?" "Yes, Fanny." "Well, where is that girl now?"

"Who is that lady dressed in black, mamma?" asked Bobby, as he sat with his mother on a ferryboat. "That is a sister of charity, my boy," replied his mother. Bobby pondered deeply for a moment, and then he said: "Which is she, mamma, faith or hope?"

From the mouth of our young hopeful of five summers, who was with us in San Francisco a short time since, and was out in Market street when the governor's funeral was passing: He was very much affected by the sad music, and looking around to me, he said: "Mother, there are two things that will make anybody cry." "What are they?" I said. "Oh, onions and solemn tunes," he said.

"Oh, papa!" exclaimed little Johnny, "I wish I had a dog like Billy Swett's. When Billy came home yesterday he had a newspaper, and his dog met him at the station, and put the paper in his pants pocket and ran home with it." "Put the newspaper in his pocket? In his mouth, I guess." "Yes, papa, that's what I meant. His mouth is his pants pocket, isn't it—or the pocket where he pants."

A little girl three years old attended church for the first time with her older sister. During the sermon she heard the minister mention the name of God several times, and acted as if she knew he was doing something wrong. At last she could stand it no longer. The next time he said it she rose up in her seat, and pointing her chubby finger at him, she said in impressiv tones, "Man 'top your swearin'!"

Correspondence.

NEWLON, MONT., Aug. 30, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I thought I would write a few lines to the Children's Corner for the first time. I am eleven years old. I do not go to school in the summer; we only hav school in the winter time. My father is a Freethinker, and he takes THE TRUTH SEEKER. I like to read the Children's Corner. I think the pictures are very funny. I hav one sister and two brothers. My sister's name is Rena, and my brothers' names are George and Charlie. Well, I will stop for this time. From your Freethinker friend,

NORA A. LOVERING.

MONTESANO, WASH., Aug. 28, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: Papa has taken THE TRUTH SEEKER for ten years. We like to look at the pictures, and I like to read the Corner. School will commence September 1st. I expect to go the whole term. I study reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, physiology, geography, and spelling. Professor Bryon is my teacher.

W. S. Bell was here the 19th, 20th, and 21st, and gave us three lectures. He had a full house every time. We enjoyed it very much, as our family are all Liberals. I hav "The Story Hour," and like it very much.

THE STRUGGLE
FOR Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind-hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Motherhood.

From out the font of being, undefiled,
A life hath been upheaved with struggle and with pain;
Safe in her arms a mother holds again
That dearest miracle—a new-born child.
The moans of anguish terrible and wild—
As shrieks the night-wind through an ill-shut pane—
Pure heaven succeeds; and after fiery strain
Victorious woman smiles serenely mild.

Yea, shall she not rejoice, shall not her frame
Thrill with a mystic rapture at this birth!
The soul now kindled by her flame,
May it not prove a gift of priceless worth—
Some savior of his kind, whose starry fame
May bring a brightness to the darkened earth?

—Mathilde Blind.

A Basket of Chips.

SHOULDERING THEIR MOTHER'S SIN.

Editor Daily News: A preacher in New York has lately said that all crimes might be readily and adequately punished by immediately shooting the offenders, if it were not for the squeamish sentiment of justice. West Springfield seems to hav attained that high view of moral vengeance and lost sight of both justice and mercy in the execution of the law. A poor woman here has been confined in durance vile for being too much like Rahab, the harlot of Jericho, who entertained two gentlemen, but she had her house saved for her hospitality. But that is not all; while her guests are gone free, in respectability, this woman's two children were left alone uncared for, except by the generosity of a co tenant, and worse, they and their belongings were turned out by the landlord.

A kind woman, making no pretensions to piety, took in the cast outs, who are not out-casts. The boy, a slim lad of sixteen, is in employment that enables him to provide for the two. As their mother is parted from her children for three months, would it not be well for the selectmen to look into the matter? It is too much to force the mother away and leave her children to their own devices and chance charity—not of Christians, for they hav given none in the case. Such morality is being righteous over-much. TWO CITIZENS.

My attention was called to the above case—this report is what I learned upon inquiry on the premises. This moves me to remark, how much justice is there in meting out punishment to offenders at the expense of greater misery to the sensitiv and innocent than is felt by the stupidly wicked? How shall it be expected that the dull and crooked will learn to respect law when under the recoil of its lash the blameless receive the severest smart, and the society which the measure is supposed to protect has no mercy, but much odium, for the children of the criminal? Is not iendliness to the well-behaved as obligatory as is indignation toward the evil-doer?

WORK AND WORTH.

Honor and shame from no conditions rise.
Act well your part, there all the honor lies.
—A. Pope.

In the story of the Immanuel it is related that the master rebuked the false pride and selfish ambition of his disciples by washing their feet, and to further impress them with the democratic idea, he ordered them to wash one another's feet. If such a course would hav the desired effect it were well if the practice had been continued to this day, but doubtless, like other pious ordinances, it would as often as otherwise be but a form of service evading the purpose.

The writer is led to these remarks by noticing the disrespect tauntingly offered by young sons of rest to a physician not without repute as a care-taker of troublesome feet, this idea being that as he has condescended to be only a corn-doctor, he is therefore entitled to contempt and maltreatment.

Handsome is that handsome does, and he should be in honor who wholesome makes the foot. He best deserves who best serves. Whether a man be a hod-carrier or a lawyer, a scavenger or a preacher, a wood-sawer or a saw-bones, a tooth-carpenter or a corn-cutter, it matters not as to his respectability; the only questions should be, does he do his work well? does he behave himself as a good citizen? The smallest performance is more worthy than the largest pretension, and in the shoes of even a corn-doctor may walk more nobility than strides under the tallest college president's hat. Why is the dentist one of the elite, and the chiropodist put under feet? Those who hoot and stone the corn-curer to-day may hail him six months hence to cure their corns. Even so

Times go by turns and chances change by course,
From foul to fair, from better hap to worse.

WORK FOR FREETHINKERS.

We should hav Freethought colleges and Secular missions, and even isolated Freethinkers might do better than "drift with the stream." They might let their children pass their Sundays in the freedom of the forests and mountains to worship the God of nature in his own temple.—Prof. Felix L. Oswald.

I cut the above from a recent Investigator. Yes, there is work for Freethinkers when such things are quoted favorably in Freethought papers, when such men as Felix L. Oswald make such perverse slips of the pen, and when those who pride themselvs on their Infidelity to orthodoxy, read these vaporings and call them refreshing. Who is this God of nature, and where is his temple, that we should worship him? Nature we know—some of it—and find it useful when we hav transformed it; but this worship business is too thin. Shoot God and giv us something good to eat.

BY-BYE, BUSTLE.

Bustle, O bustle, we bid you adieu.
We are glad that the ladies hav gone back on you;
We rejoice with exceeding great gladness to know
The fiat of fashion compels you to go.
Begone to the shades of the dim, remote hence!
Would that all such delusions could follow you thence.
May we never more see such a humbug as you;
Get thee gone, then, O bustle, tra-la-lee, tra-la-loo.

—Frank B. Welch, in Arkansaw Traveler.

A woman might do much worse than to wear a bustle, but hardly adopt anything in apparel more ridiculous. No wonder the wearers hav gone back on them. But doubtless bustles hav served more than one useful purpose in their time, and perhaps, in case they were made of newspapers, the fair hav had more intelligence on their hips than the stern always held in their heads.

JOHN P. GUILD.

Hear Romanists Talk.

From the Western American.

It is utterly wrong to circulate the scriptures in the vulgar tongue.—Archbishop Ximenes.

We pronounce it a false, scandalous, and blasphemous error to hold that all may read the holy scriptures.—A bull by Clement II.

To giv the Bible to the laity is to cast pearls before swine. Bible translations hav done harm. I would not hav any.—Cardinal Hosius.

The Bible societies, which thrust the Bible into the hands of inexperienced youth, I denounce them as crafty and deceitful societies. —Pope Pius IX.

The Bible society is the deepest scheme ever laid by Satan in order to delude the human family and bring them down to his eternal possession.—Freeman's Journal.

We forbid the reading of the Bible in any vernacular tongue, and decree that the laity must not possess the books of the Old and New Testaments.—Council of Toulouse.

I would rather a half of the people of this nation should be brought to the stake and burnt, than one man should read the Bible and form his own judgment from its contents. —Bishop Spotswood.

Catholics are forbidden to read the Bible without a special license granted to them in writing by the bishops or fathers inquisitors. —Fourth rule of the Index Expurgatorius, bulls issued by Pius IV. and Clement VIII.

The council of Trent desires that no Bible shall be held or read except by priests, that no Bible shall be sold without a license, except on the pains and penalties of that moral sin that is neither to be forgiven in this world or the next.—Father Paul Sarpe's History of the Council.

We hav been truly shocked at this most crafty device (Bible societies) by which the very foundations of religion are undermined. We hav deliberated upon the measures proper to be adopted by our pontifical authority in order to remedy and abolish this pestilence as far as possible, this defilement of faith so imminently dangerous to souls. It becomes a special duty that you, first of all, expose this nefarious scheme. It is evident from experience that the holy scriptures when circulated in the vulgar tongue, hav, through the temerity of men, produced more harm than benefit. Warn the people intrusted to your care that they fall not into the snares prepared for their everlasting ruin.—Pope Pius VII. in 1816.

Canada.

[The following telegram to the New York Herald, from Toronto, was evidently written by a partisan of the Jesuits, but it is valuable as giving one side of the question at issue :]

TORONTO, June 29th.—It is urged in Ontario that power given the pope by the Jesuits' Estate act, as passed by the Quebec legislature, threatens the supremacy of the queen, and all loyal Canadians are urged to rise in defense of the integrity and continuance of British institutions in this country.

In case of war, owing to the superior drill of the church forces, they would get first, and not unlikely second, and even third blood; but finally, did the agitation continue, the numerical superiority of the Protestant section must overtop their opponents and giv them a majority in the house of commons.

What would then occur is apparent. After a bitter, vindictiv, possibly not bloodless, campaign, lasting with increasing hate and growing malice through many years—a religious civil war that would divide neighborhoods and families—it is hardly to be expected that the struggle-stained majority would be superbly calm or morbidly considerate. If these should hav in them any of the spirit of their ancestors, they would strip the Roman Catholic church of its ancient privileges and immunities with hasty hands, and the times would be gracious indeed if they should go no further or not meddle with the bulwarks of French nationality.

The course of the Catholic minority is equally plain. If rebellion meant bloody war in the name of the mother church and New France they would rebel. But rebellion would simply mean negotiations at Washington and the substitution of the stars and stripes for the union jack. It is true they might be compelled to giv up some of the privileges granted by the treaty of Paris, but it would be a choice between sacrificing a portion in an alliance with a friendly people or having the whole wrenched from their fingers by a victorious majority, with whom they had been in long, bitter conflict. And who is there that knows anything of cis-Atlantic politics, its close counts and its shady bargainings, but believes that the Catholic hierarchy could speedily buy back these lost privileges in exchange for a state vote? And who is there that is more familiar with the political market than the Roman Catholic hierarchy itself?

It may be and will be objected that this is a purely Canadian view of the matter, and that the United States is not so exceedingly ready to receive Canada into its family circle. That I will not dispute, but would like to intimate that some of us fancy that an American government would not callously refuse to shelter a distressed Catholic province from British tyranny, especially were it to leak out that their Irish Catholic fellow-citizens would look upon it as a meritorious action.

In the mean time the Mail and Globe, the two largest Toronto dailies, are persistently calling for disallowance, mass-meetings are being held with frequency, and there is a decided smell of burning heath in the air.

Christian and Mohammedan Civilization.

From the London Fortnightly Review.

The gin trade is associated in the minds of the African nativs with the Christian, as the slave trade is in ours with the Mohammedan. It is that which, under our wise British rule, soonest raises a brisk trade and is most profitable to the trader. British rule is, indeed, largely supported by it. The warehouses along the coast are filled with it, the very air seems to reek with the vile stuff, and every hut is redolent with its poisonous fumes. If you go outside such towns as Sierra Leone, which form tiny conservatories of civilized growths artificially kept alive, you will not see the slightest evidence that the nativs hav been influenced for good by such trading relations as we permit our merchants to hav with them. Quite the opposit, in fact. Thanks to our system of administration, our delicacy in dealing with the rights and liberties of our "black brethren," and our drastic discouragement of legitimate trade, the country is sinking to moral and physical perdition. The resources of the country remain undeveloped, and the land is uncultivated. Sunk in brutality and vice, without their parallel in the interior, the people will not work beyond what is necessary to supply themselvs with the wherewithal to satisfy their cravings for drink. Before this all-conquering appetite, the only one fostered on the coast, they hav sunk deeper and deeper into the slough of their natural and acquired depravity. Our West African settlements, instead of being bright jewels in the imperial crown of Great Britain, are at this day standing monuments to our disgrace. Our government has done all it could—unwittingly, it must, of course, be admitted—to suppress all habits of industry. It has made sure that no healthy tastes, no varied wants, should be aroused. The result is now seen in the fact that our two centuries of intercourse with the West Coast negro hav transformed him into the most villainous, vicious, and despicable being in the whole of Africa. I speak but the plain truth when I say that, if the map of Africa was tinted according to the moral and physical status of its various peoples, it would show an ever-increasing depth of color as the coast settlements were neared—the result of the slave trade in the last century and the gin traffic and other causes traceable to our Downing-street policy in the present.

Rome Has Captured Massachusetts.

From the American, Marlboro, Mass.

In May we published a statement in the American that Rome had captured sixty-eight cities and large towns of Massachusetts, virtually giving her the control of this old Protestant commonwealth.

Recently a friend has written us to know what was our authority for the statement that the control of the government of sixty-eight of our Massachusetts towns had passed out of American hands.

We hav not the exact statistics readily at hand. The first public utterance was made in a boastful and threatening way by the Roman lawyer who engineered the parochial school schemes in the legislativ hearings.

We verified the truth of this statement to our own satisfaction in three ways:

1. By a careful examination of the statistics of illiteracy as published in the state census reports.

2. By examination of the names of the school committees and public school teachers as recorded in the state board of education books.

3. By personal inquiries throughout the state.

Our own belief is that for all practical purposes Rome has now permanent control of the state. Perhaps a few thousand citizens, who are nominally Protestants, hold the balance of power between the Catholics and Protestants. But these weak-kneed neutrals, while nominally Protestants, can safely be counted on the Roman side, because they never protest and always stand ready to obey the behests of Roman bosses.

Rome instructs her adherents that no penal law needs to be obeyed, only canon laws are binding upon them. On all our juries there are enough Romanists to always protect Rum and Roman interests. Both political parties fear the solidity of priestly influence, and very few individual Christians hav moral and financial strength enough to show any backbone in the presence of a most malicious and cruel boycott. The Republican leaders are appalled by this solid and secret organization of Jesuitism that bids fair soon to throw the state out of their control permanently.

A Book Notice.

From the Banner of Light.

HEBREW MYTHOLOGY; or, The Rationale of the Bible, Wherein it is Shown that the Holy Scriptures Treat of Natural Phenomena Only. By Milton Wooley, M.D. Illustrated, 8vo, cloth, pp. 613. $3. New York: The Truth Seeker Co.

Many years ago the author, though having passed his sixtieth year, began a study of the Hebrew language in order to obtain access to the treasure which he realized was hidden within the scripture. His effort was in his own view so successful that he thought it susceptible of demonstration, and this he set himself at the laborious task of doing, the result of which he places before the public in this volume. He adopts the zodiacal theory, to understand which, he says, a profound knowledge of astronomy is not necessary, simply such as may be acquired from a common elementary treatis. As an aid to an understanding of the book there is affixed to it a picture of the zodiac, with an index and globe. He claims that the system he employs unravels each and all of the most difficult problems of the Old Testament, irrespectiv of the intricacy in which they may appear to be involved. The story of the creation given in Genesis he considers a myth, in which is to be found the sum and substance of the whole Bible; every subsequent myth, be its name what it may, being but a modification of this; that though they may seem to differ widely, a careful analysis proves them to be essentially one—a description of the phenomena of the year, or some part thereof.

BUT the triumph of the scientific method is, as yet, far from complete; and not until a science of morals is as definitly recognized as a science of eclipses, or of any phenomenon whatever, can the era of science be said to hav more than begun. When she shall hav mastered the principles of morals, as she already has the principles of physics, and when the science of morals, thus formulated, shall hav become an applied science, then real progress in morals will be assured, and will be as much more rapid than it has hitherto been, as the advance in physical science in these modern times has surpassed the slow growth of the pre-scientific era.—Prof. Frances Emily White.

SPEAKING of typographical errors, we do not remember seeing a more horrible specimen of this class of blunders than one which appeared in a Massachusetts paper not long ago. WHAT is the language of experience as to these attempts, what their unvarying history? Look at them from the world's beginning to the present time: you see the same vicious circle ever fulfilled; you find everywhere an invasion of rights. The establishment of a specific form of religion cannot be found, in any one instance, in harmony with an entire equality of civil rights, that equality which members of human society hav a right to claim from the government under which they liv. A priesthood has almost always been the enemy of public liberty. Philosophical historians trace the connection between different forms of religion and government, discriminating them by this very circumstance, and showing, either that in proportion as governments grow despotic, there are modes of religion on which they look with peculiar favor, or else that there are modes of religion which tend to make governments more despotic than they would otherwise become. THERE is a doubt if the total destruction of all cities of the civilized world could hav struck a more cruel blow to science than the dogma of salvation by faith and abstinence from the pursuit of free inquiry. The ethics of the world-renouncing fanatic condemned the love of secular knowledge as they condemned the love of health and the pursuit of physical prosperity, and the children of the next fifty generations were systematically trained to despise the highest attribute of the human spirit. Spiritual poverty became a test of moral worth; philosophers and free inquirers were banished, while mental castrates were fattened at the expense of toiling rustics and mechanics; science was dreaded as an ally of skepticism, if not of the arch-fiend in person; the suspicion of sorcery attached to the cultivation of almost any intellectual pursuit, and the emperor Justinian actually passed a law for the "suppression of mathematicians." When the tyranny of the church reached the zenith of its power, natural science became almost a tradition of the past. The pedants of the convent schools divided their time between the forgery of miracle legends and the elaboration of insane dogmas. The most extravagant absurdities were propagated under the name of historical records; medleys of nursery tales and ghost stories which the poorest village school-teacher of pagan Rome would hav rejected with disgust were gravely discussed by so-called scholars.—*Prof. Felix L. COMPLAINTS hav been louder this summer than ever before on account of the absence, during August, of Protestant clergymen from their parishes. It is said, as an illustrativ incident, that in Waterbury, Conn., a city of thirty thousand inhabitants, a Protestant clergyman could not be found to perform a marriage ceremony.

AT Cincinnati at the session on the 3d of the Central German Roman Catholic Society, a resolution was adopted to encourage the immigration of Catholic foreigners to this country. It is proposed to pay especial attention to farmers, who will be sent to join Catholic parishes in the West, or be banded together to form new parishes.

THE dedication and opening of the new Catholic University will occur Wednesday, November 13th, and invitations to the ceremonies are now being issued. All the bishops of the Catholic church in the United States, Canada, England, Ireland, and Scotland will be invited, together with the heads of European and American educational institutions, the president of the United States, the members of his cabinet, Congress, the judiciary, etc. Cardinal Gibbons will conduct the dedicatory ceremonies.

WOMAN suffrage does not lose in the new state constitutions. DR. P. BRYCE, president of the state insane asylum at Tuscaloosa, delivered recently a lecture before the state convention of teachers in Birmingham, Ala., advocating the doctrin of evolution. One of these pieces represents a young mother teaching her child to walk. The object that called forth the czar's displeasure is a toy locomotiv, which the child draws by a string, and on which is the name "Liberty." This slight allusion not only severed the czar's friendship, but rendered it necessary for the sculptor to leave the country.

THERE are many indications that the crime of bigamy is fast increasing in frequency in this country, and that it is viewed with remarkable indifference in many communities. Of a large class of cases the public hear very little by reason of the reluctance of the injured parties to prosecute the offender. Even if bigamy is regarded as a serious offense, those who are most injured by the crime are ordinarily unwilling to punish the criminal. Here is an interesting subject for the student of social science. There are many good people who are wont to attribute almost every form of crime to the effects of drink. It will be a little difficult, however, we imagin, to make the liquor traffic responsible in any degree for the increased prevalence of bigamy.—Sun.

A LAYMAN writes to say that he hopes, before the discussion of ministerial titles is dropped, some one will turn his attention to "reverend," as a clerical prefix or title. "I can see," he says, "a reason for the 'D.D.,' provided it tells the truth as to the man and he got it honestly, but as to the 'Rev.' I am in darkness." The request seems to us to be pertinent. If our Lord meant to prohibit for all time the use by his followers of any distinctiv title or appellation, in such commands as, "Be not ye called rabbi," the conscientious scruples of some ministers seem to us greatly misplaced. The real objection, to our mind, is not to a scholastic degree given to but a few and by reason of certain supposed attainments of scholarship, but to a title given to every minister as such. There are many laymen quite as "reverend," i.e., to be reverenced or respected, as any minister, but to the latter alone is the title "Rev." applied.—Baptist Examiner.

Who Owns the Schools?

To what extent the state should exercise control over the schools is not exactly clear. If the state has a right to exist, it would seem to follow that it would hav the right to adopt any measures necessary to perpetuate its existence.

All will admit that the perpetuity of our free institutions must depend upon the intelligence of the people. It would seem like a fair inference, therefore, that the state should not only make provisions for educating the people, but it should make attendance compulsory.

It must be legitimate for the state to see that the schools are so conducted as to turn out good citizens. But it has no right to say that any system of religion shall be taught until it is first shown that the perpetuity of the state depends upon such teaching. The moment the state attempts to teach any system of religion by its authority a union of the state and the church has been effected; for that would be enacting a law to establish a religion, which the Constitution expressly forbids. Until some one is able to show that in some age or country the people at large hav been benefited by a union of church and state, and that such union will benefit the people of this country, the state must not allow, much less enforce, religious instruction in the schools.

It is no business of the state to inquire after a man's religion, or to ask whether he has any at all or not. The only business of the state is to hav good citizens.

Our government was instituted a hundred years ago, and the equality of man was recognized as the chief corner-stone. A hundred years hence it will doubtless be just what we make it.

That there is great danger from the foreign element constantly flocking to our shores no thoughtful person will deny; but as long as our schools are conducted on the basis of equal rights to all, and attendance made compulsory, there is little danger to be feared.

There is nothing more alarming than the disposition manifested by some to run the schools in the interest of some class or sect. Such men will always prove a dangerous element in the body politic. Every comprehensiv mind will see the danger of such measures. Because when it is admitted that the rights of any class can be ignored, the same rule at any time can be turned upon any other class.

It is generally believed that whatever is dictated by majorities is right. But majorities hav no right to enslave minorities. Indeed, all the people in the United States would hav no right to vote one man into slavery; because the great object of the founders of the government was to secure the "blessings of liberty" and the "pursuit of happiness," unimpaired, in perpetuity to the people.

With these first principles in mind, we may ask, "Who owns the schools?"

It must be apparent to all that men are not to be allowed to exercise control of the schools in proportion to the amount of taxes they pay. When a son of the humblest individual in the state knocks at the school-room door, he is to be just as freely admitted as the son of a Gould or a Vanderbilt.

There are many who believe that the principles of their religion are of vastly more importance than the principles which underlie the government. Cardinal Gibbons says that "religious knowledge is as far above human science as the soul is above the body, as heaven is above earth, as eternity is above time."

It will be seen that this enthusiast puts his religion above every earthly consideration. Of course all science must be made to conform to the book of Genesis, or it is not science at all, and is not to be tolerated. It was this erroneous doctrin of putting religion above science that persecuted Galileo and burnt Bruno, and brought on the midnight of the Dark Ages. Freedom of thought is the foundation of our free institutions. But there can be no freedom of thought when such ideas become the ruling policy of the state. Cardinal Gibbons further says: "The religious instructions given once a week in our Sunday-schools are insufficient to supply the wants of our children. It is important that they should every day breathe a healthy religious atmosphere in school."

Thus, according to the cardinal, the very atmosphere of the school-room is to be tinctured or tainted with religion. Is not this a little too much of a good thing? A religious education being of so much more importance than a secular education, the cardinal would doubtless hav most of the time devoted to that object. But suppose some should differ from him? That would make no kind of difference. They may be wrong. He is guided by the counsel of God; he cannot err. He and God will make a majority every time.

He says that "every day our youth must put in practice the commandments of God as well as the rules of arithmetic." But who is to interpret these commandments of God? Cardinal Gibbons. But what provision does he make for those who differ from him? Just none at all; their rights are not to be considered.

Science, the schools, and every act of government would be made to bend to his peculiar ideas if he had the power. This is the very spirit and pith of tyranny. If Cardinal Gibbons had control of the schools, no teacher would be considered competent except a Catholic. The exercises would be mostly religious, because the most important; or, at least, the training would be such as to keep the masses in a condition to be imposed upon by the priesthood.

The wonderful power of God would be forever kept before the minds of the pupils. Because with this idea indelibly stamped upon the mind the priesthood, God's duly appointed agents, would be clothed with power emanating from him, and would the more readily be held in awe and veneration by the common herd. Such is Christian intolerance and bigotry, and such must always be the result of what is called a Christian education.

Having ascertained Cardinal Gibbons's place for conducting the religious exercises in school, let us see how other Christians will agree with him.

One would be led to think that when the "principles of the Christian religion" are only taught there would be nothing but harmony, especially among Christians. Let us see. The Rev. Dr. Hill says, "Least of all is a Catholic parochial school capable of fulfilling the political ends of a good education, since in them is not only that partial and distorted view of history, but a limitation of the right of private judgment which must partially unfit the pupil for considering questions of public policy with an unbiased mind."

Thus it will be seen that as soon as Cardinal Gibbons introduces his peculiar scheme of religious instruction, there is a fight on hand between him and the reverend doctor, and instead of being an intellectual nursery, the school-room becomes a religious battle-field.

Dr. Hill would never consent to send his children to the cardinal's school, and Catholics might as well "wade in hell" as to attend the doctor's schools. And what kind of an education would children get in the smoke of such a battle?

But it must not be inferred that the Rev. Dr. Hill is not in favor of religious instruction in the schools—far from it. For he says, "It is a political necessity." But he says "it must be done by the selection of teachers—by the selection of wholesome reading, and by daily brief exercises, at which a passage from the Bible shall be read, a prayer recited, and perhaps a hymn sung."

But who is going to select the teacher? Dr. Hill. And if he is a Presbyterian, would he not prefer a teacher of that persuasion? And if a Methodist, then a Methodist teacher, and so on.

Would the cardinal be satisfied with the doctor's teacher? No. Who is to select the wholesome reading? Dr. Hill, or his selected teacher. Would the cardinal consider it wholesome? No. Whose Bible is to be used? The doctor's. Would that suit the cardinal? By no manner of means. Would the prayer be acceptable to the cardinal? Not at all. Would not the "hymn" giv umbrage to the cardinal? Undoubtedly. In short, would not the "religious exercises" bring the doctor and the cardinal to a square "face-to-face" fight? And what is the fate of the school when neither the doctor nor the cardinal will patronize it?

If the one having charge of a school chanced to be a Methodist, would not the complexion of the school probably smack of Methodism? Or would not some Presbyterian fancy such to be the case? And would there not be a desire on the part of the Presbyterian to hav a Presbyterian teacher? And would not jealousies arise and quarrels follow?

It is thought by many that Blair's proposition to teach the simple "principles of the Christian religion" could not reasonably giv offense to any. Could the "principles of the Christian religion" be taught without introducing the New Testament into the schools? The Christian would insist that a "portion of the New Testament should be read every day, and a prayer recited and perhaps a hymn sung."

If this is done to please the Christian, will it not outrage the Jew? What kind of Christian teaching would it be with Christ left out? Would not the Jew insist that such teaching was an outrage to his children? The Jew would probably exclude the New Testament from the school, and that would render it obnoxious to both Catholic and Protestant.

And the Jew's rights are as sacred as any, and he is as much entitled to the privilege of directing the education of his children as the Catholic or Protestant.

Again: Professor Harris concludes that "it is the conviction of the average American citizen that the rights of private conscience must be respected, and that church and state should forever be entirely separate. If the state undertakes to regulate religious matters confusion occurs. In parochial schools the influence of the dogmatic tone creeps into the secular recitations, and drives out a desirable critical alertness and investigating spirit, and stifles independent thinking."

Thus it will be seen we hav a four-cornered fight on our hands and one which never can be decided, for it has been raging for hundreds of years, and is no nearer a settlement than when it began. And, worst of all, the fight is to be carried on in one of the most undesirable battle-grounds in the world, viz., the school-room.

Just as soon as a system of religious instruction is prescribed for the schools a fight must follow—it is inevitable. The Jew will never agree with the Christian, the Protestant can never agree with the Catholic.

Then there are Atheists, Agnostics, Deists, Unitarians, and Adventists, whose claims are as much to be respected as the others.

To conduct the schools so as to please all of these religious sects would be impossible. To say that the rights of one sect are more sacred than the other, is to say that all men are not "created equal." To say that the most numerous sect shall be favored to the exclusion of all the rest, brings us where it is pertinent again to ask, "Who owns the schools?" Are Methodists, or Presbyterians, or Catholics to enjoy privileges which are to be denied to Jews or Unitarians?

There are some who believe that this is a Christian government, and that therefore there ought to be religious instruction in the schools. But where is the warrant for such belief? Certainly not in the Constitution. In the preamble the aims and objects of the Constitution are clearly set forth. They are to provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, to secure the blessings of liberty, etc. But not one word about God or Christianity, or religion of any kind, except that Congress shall make no law to establish any religion.

There are those who honestly believe that the passage of the Blair bill would be for the common good. But they fail to see that it would convert every school-room into a religious battle-ground and that the battle could never end, for the sects can never agree. Let the Blair bill become a law, and immediately the firebrands will fly. How are these "principles" to be established? Is not the keeping of the Sabbath a Christian principle? Then which is the holy day? Are the Presbyterians or Methodists to say which it is more than the Jews or Adventists? Again we ask, Who owns the schools?

Cardinal Gibbons says it is important that our children should breathe a healthy religious atmosphere every day in school, and that religious knowledge is as far above human science as heaven is above earth. But he does not mean Mr. Blair's kind of religious knowledge, he means that taught in the Catholic church. Let Mr. Blair introduce his principles into the schools, and the cardinal will kick higher than a mule.

With any or all religious beliefs the state has nothing to do. For the state to attempt to conduct the schools so as to cater to any of those beliefs would not only be unconstitutional, but would engender endless disputes between the different religious sects, and none would be better satisfied than now.

The business of the state is to see that the schools are so conducted as to turn out first-rate citizens. Here its mission ends. It has no right to inquire whether a teacher is Catholic, Protestant, or Atheist. For whatever his religious proclivities may be they are to be left outside of the school-room. The state has a right to ask but few questions of a teacher—indeed, they may be reduced to two, viz.: Is he competent? is he a man of exemplary character?

Pupils should be taught to respect the rights of others. Their education should be such as to make them keen, quick, self-reliant, and independent. The mind should be trained to think, analyze, compare, and investigate, and to weigh impartially without fear or favor all matters in the great balance of reason. The "religious" training must come from other teachers and other sources.

If Cardinal Gibbons and Dr. Hill do not like to hav their children trained in such schools, it is unfortunate for them that they were born in an age when the light is too strong for their owlish eyes. They ought to hav been born in the shadow of the Dark Ages when nothing but religious instruction was given.

There can be but one practical course to pursue, and that is to wholly exclude all religious instruction and exercises from the schools, so that people of every religious belief can meet on a common basis without arousing the prejudices of any.

If the Catholics or Methodists or Presbyterians think that because their respectiv sects are more numerous than some others, they should exercise privileges which the others do not enjoy, let them show what authority has granted such privileges. If all these sects were merged into one, their rights would not be augmented. "Who owns the schools?" Neither the Methodists nor the Presbyterians nor the Catholics, nor any other religious sect, owns the schools, any more than the Democrats or the Republicans or Prohibitionists. And they hav no more right to foist their religious dogmas into the schools than these parties hav to teach the political doctrins which characterize them.

Naples, N. Y. JOHN PECK.

Some Contradictions.

Among the contradictions found in so-called holy writ, none are so striking as those between the first three gospels and John.

Never were two characters more different than the Jesus of, say Matthew and John. Either one is false, or the other. In Matthew he claims to be merely son of man. God is his father as he is the father of all. In the tenth chapter, twentieth verse, he tells his followers, "The spirit of your father speaks in you." In John he takes a different tone. In a muddy jargon he makes long speeches about "I and my father" being one. In Matthew he assures his hearers that if they do as they would be done by, they are safe. In the Sermon on the Mount the poor in spirit, the pure in heart, the merciful, are assured of salvation.

Violators of the least commandments are warned that they shall be least in the heavenly kingdom; but those who do and teach others to do one of the least commandments shall be called great in the kingdom. This is mere trifling, or it means that those who violate some of the commandments, yet do and teach others, take high place in heaven. He often speaks of great and greater rewards and punishments; and, threatening the Pharisees, assures them that it shall be more tolerable for Sodom than for them.

"If ye forgiv men, your heavenly father will forgiv you"—no matter what you may do, for it is unconditional. If you don't forgiv men, he won't forgiv you, no matter how good you are. But we know that a man can't love his fellows, be meek in spirit, etc., without naturally forgiving trespassers against him. At least, he could get a low place in heaven, anyhow.

"What shall I do to be saved?" "Sell all thou hast and giv to the poor." "That is all." Such an act includes love, forgivness, meekness, etc. At least, he who does so is safe. He may not sit with "a crown on his head and judge one of the tribes," but he will be measurably happy—will hav cool waters to quench his thirst, though he may not rest in the bosom of Lazarus or Abraham either. A rich man cannot enter the kingdom of heaven. "It is impossible with man, but possible with God." Nor can a heathen, an Infidel, a wicked outlaw—and no drunkard can. But with God it is possible. Lazarus, though we are not told he was pious, went to heaven simply by being a beggar. The rich man, though not a bad man so far as we know, lifted up his eyes in hell—simply because he was once a rich man.

By the way, although the whole soul of the synoptic gospels is broad and liberal, kindly, and common sense—all based on the idea of degrees of reward and of punishment, and of limitation of time as to penalties, with innumerable positiv assurances that a simple act or condition will place the actor or recipient in heaven, and Paul's comments declare often that there is no penalty of sin where there is ignorance of law, etc.—yet the Pharisees "compassing land and sea to make one proselyte, and teaching for doctrin the commands of men, and shutting up the kingdom of heaven against men," the Pharisees of Christianity seize eagerly upon election that applies to temporal affairs, and a few rhetorical flourishes of doubtful authenticity, in a very doubtful book, and would actually hav it that some omnipotent hellyon, some fiend as devilish as he is powerful, sends ninety-nine hundredths of humanity into eternal dole and awful torment. The truth is, he who thinks he believes this is a fool; he who will believe it is a scoundrel equal in wickedness to his demon God The power of his God can save a rich man, though impossible; the power of the same God can't save unnumbered millions of babes and ignorant persons. How ridiculous! But he can save, you will say. Oh, and yet does not! Then I reply the pirate, Blackbeard, and Inquisitor, Torquemada, were gentlemen and Christian saints compared with him.

So much for Matthew & Co.

The Jesus of them declares that whoever is humble, poor in spirit, or pardons trespasses, or does as he would be done by, or becomes as a little child, shall enter the kingdom, unconditionally.

The Jesus of John begins a different tale. First to a gentleman of the name of Nicodemus he givs positiv assurance that unless a man is born of water and spirit, he can't see God. He also adds several other conditions that hav not a thing to do with his former positiv assurances. He tells him God sent his son down from heaven to be sacrificed, so that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, and that those who do not believe in him are condemned already, because they hav not believed in the name of the only begotten son of God. "Here's flat burglary," or something else.

What must the young man hav said whom he told to sell all he had and giv to the poor? He hath become poor in spirit, as in purse; he hath become like a child, even a very small one; he hath forgiven trespasses—hath done and taught some of the least commands in order to get a good place "up there."

Now for the first time he hears about this being born again—this water-work, this conjuration with a name, "presto, veto," etc. If he reads on he finds several other things he must believe and confess. He finds this same one who rebuked him for calling him even good, claiming to be the same as God Almighty himself, and also that there is a third partner called the paraclete, comforter, holy angel, or ghost—an awful personage, too, concerning whose name people had best—"Oh, breathe not his name!"

Briefly, no two characters of history differ more than the Jesus of Matthew and of John. HOLT.

Our London Letter.

The Catholic journals are exceedingly jubilant over a fresh batch of miraculous cures effected at Notre Dame de Lourdes. A young girl from Alencon who had been blind for two years immediately recovered her sight when taken into the grotto, and a navvy from Chartres who had been a paralytic cripple for years was made whole. Other miracles hav been performed of a similar nature, all guaranteed by the priests as genuin. The Protestant organs with their usual inconsistency deny the truth of these, while still holding to those reputed to hav taken place eighteen centuries ago. The Protestants must bitterly regret that the founders of their sect set aside miracles as imposture, for there is no such speedy way for fleecing the faithful of goodly sums as carefully prepared miracles. The Bethshanites certainly do a little bit in the cure line, but only in a half-hearted manner, and are afraid or unable to risk capital in working up the thing in a business-like manner. No doubt however the promoters of this faith healing make a steady, comfortable income, and do not aspire to acquire a fortune in a short space of time.

The dropping of the Tithes bill by the government has aroused the ire of the men of God in whose interest it was promoted, and they are very indignant that it was not passed. Although they do not intend giving up their tithes, they are by no means anxious to get more and more unpopular through the means they use in collecting what they consider their rightful dues, and putting the dirty work of distraining on the county court bailiffs would hav relieved them of this difficulty. They will put all possible pressure on the Tory party next session to help them, but it is to be hoped they will meet with no better success than at present. The Star cites the case of a man who bought a farm near Birmingham, which he let to a tenant, who was to pay tithes and deduct the amount from his rent. The farmer came to grief, and his landlord distrained for rent, allowing the tithes to be deducted on the assurance that they had been paid. The agent of the tithe-owner (Earl Amherst) was told of this beforehand, and promised to see that the farmer paid. The farmer having cleared out, the agent sent a demand to the landlord for the amount, and followed this up with a writ; whereupon the landlord sent his check for the claim, £7 5s. 6d., and received it back with a demand for costs, amounting to £11 5s. 4d., which had to be paid. In this case the tithe-owner appears to hav been a layman, who did not even pretend to do anything in return for the money, but it illustrates the manner in which the obnoxious tax is enforced In Wales this little performance is of such frequent occurrence that but rare notice is taken in the daily papers. Yet, in the face of all this, there are plenty of people who will stoutly assert that the church does not depend in any way upon the state.

The Nonconformists maintain that the church as by law established has fallen away from the faith, and the true article can only be found in their chapels, where all is harmony and love, and the favorit abode of the Holy Ghost. Then how do they account for the dispute in the Baptist chapel at Walworth, which has had to be settled by a judge in chancery? It appears that the pastor, having disagreed with certain members of his congregation, expelled them, and they appealed to the judge to be restored; this has been done and the pastor has been compelled to retire. The law costs hav been pretty heavy, and the chapel funds hav to be sweated to pay the piper, which must be a great satisfaction to the members who were not in the quarrel. Now what I should like to know is, what the Holy Ghost was up to in letting things get into such a parlous state. Possibly he left the concern a long time ago, or was not aware of its existence, there being so many of them about.

Dr. Barnardo may be doing a good work in deporting waifs to Canada, but if he was not such a pious man some inquiry would be instituted as to what is their eventual fate. They seem to be swallowed up in Manitoba, at all events none of them come back to testify as to the great benefits they receive. A letter appeared in a paper a short while back from a boy who stated he was being forced to go to Canada against his will, but as he was no one of importance and did not possess a vote, no doubt he had to go. This professional philanthropist has not shown up very well of late, and it would be satisfactory to hav his doings closely examined by an impartial committee, not of his friends by whom he was whitewashed on the last occasion.

The Salvation Army is actually doing some practical good by selling meals to the wives and children of the dock strikers at one farthing and one halfpenny a meal. If they confined themselvs to this department they would be worthy of esteem, but as apparently this cannot be disassociated from their eccentric performances we must take them as they are. No doubt their religious antics are amusing and exciting to the extremely poor, who hav no means of getting any other sort of recreation. Whatever their objects may be the Roman Catholic church looks after the poor and it is to Cardinal Manning's credit that he has tried to use his influence with the dock directors in favor of the laborers, and his conduct in this respect contrasts favorably with that of the archbishop of Canterbury, who would see the poverty-stricken east-enders die of starvation and be damned to all eternity rather than lift his finger to help them in their hard fight for bread. Resolutions on Mr. Seaver's Death.

The Chicago Secular Union at a late meeting adopted the following preamble and resolutions by Mrs. M. A. Freeman:

WHEREAS, The grand army of Freethought on this continent has recently sustained an irreparable loss by the death of Horace Seaver, the veteran editor of the Boston Investigator, who, for more than half a century, has been the leader of a dauntless host of men and women enlisted in the ennobling cause of human rights. With such men as Garrison, Phillips, and Hale, he forced the clergy of New England to lay down their slavery-supporting Bible and proclaim the rights of man, in accordance with the Declaration of Independence.

He demanded an antislavery constitution, an antislavery Bible, and an antislavery god. As well he knew that all gods are but human creatures. He knew the God created by Moses to be a cruel and tyrannical monster. He knew that Christ never founded or established a church, but was himself the creature of a Babylonish institution since the time of Constantine known as the church of Rome. And he knew that the American republic must make for itself a god whose nostrils cannot endure the stench of human slavery. With horror he has ever beheld the mental slavery of all so-called orthodox churches, earnestly condemning the Sunday-school practice of cramming the undeveloped infant mind with dogmatic, superstitious myths and other outrageous falsehoods, only calculated to degrade the coming generations to a level with European serfs. He was a genuin champion of Freethought.

He was a friend to all overtaxed and oppressed laborers. His hatred of chattel slavery was only exceeded by his hatred of mental slavery, whereby the Roman church is trying to sap the foundations of our free institutions. Probably no one man in America has done so much as has been done by the trenchant pen of Horace Seaver to free the republic from both physical and mental slavery. Therefore be it

Resolved, That we of the Chicago Secular Union, with the deepest emotions of sorrow, deplore the loss of this great and good man, and hereby extend our fullest measure of sympathy to Josiah P. Mendum, his surviving partner and coworker in a long and well-fought battle for the rights of man. And we sincerely hope that the grand old Investigator may survive the wrecks of time, and behold the relegation of all forms of fetich worship to their congenerous mausoleums, wherein are moldering the pestilential carcasses of Roman and pagan idolatry, sun worship, and all other priestly devices for enslaving and taxing the working bees in our human colonies.

Religious Mania.

Dr. Goodhart in the Lancet, London, Eng.

Picture to yourself a lady, of the pre-high-school period, of the ordinary run as regards accomplishments, and with just enough permanent income to enable her to liv without the necessity of gaining a livelihood. She is one of a family of, and she herself has, a strong religious bias. She never marries, and all her life, up to fifty-three or fifty-four years of age, her chief sources of mental exercise, save what little is obtained from a by no means activ intercourse with friends, are derived from the study of her Bible and volumes devoted to personal religion. Thus the history of such a life—and the type is, alas, pitifully common—is one of few stirring duties, of no sustained effort, of nothing that can be called in our present use of the word "education." A brain of this kind is worked almost entirely on one or two lines, and good as these in themselvs may be, it has wanted variety, just as the stomach wants and will hav, if its work is to be done properly, a variety of food. In its absence you can predict the result. The poor patient passes her later years in an asylum, a sufferer from religious mania, the natural outcome of this macadamization of one or two roadways of thought; and the consequent grass-grown obliteration of all the rest.

It Makes Capital of Its Charity.

From the Argonaut.

There is something astounding in the barefaced impudence with which the Roman Catholic church makes merchandise of charity. We said on a former occasion in these columns that this political institution is coining money for the building of its magnificent cathedrals by using its poor and unfortunates as pretenses to draw golden supplies from the public funds raised by taxation on non-Catholic property. Whenever in the future, and we hope it may be a near future, the American people shall be, by some specially glaring act of Roman rapacity, roused from their present curious and almost criminal lethargy in matters of Irish Roman Catholic aggression on American supremacy in all departments of government, they will stare with amazement at the figures which will tell them how a political church can plunder a sleeping state.

Proposed Amendments to the Constitution of the American Secular Union.

PREAMBLE.

Whereas, The Constitution of the United States, in spirit and in letter, is framed in accordance with the principle of the total separation of church and state, and,

Whereas, Notwithstanding these facts, the administration of the national government, and the administration and constitutions of the several state governments, maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church, thereby violating the spirit of the United States Constitution, and,

Auxiliary societies should adopt constitutions substantially similar to this constitution, but adapted to local wants. Local auxiliary societies shall be absolutely independent in the administration of their affairs. The effect of their charters shall be simply to unite them in cordial fellowship and efficient coöperation of the freest kind with the American Secular Union and with other local societies. Neither shall the national society be responsible for the acts or utterances of local auxiliaries.

R. B. WESTBROOK, Pres. American Secular Union.
1707 Oxford st, Philadelphia, Sept. 19, 1889.

IF we consider the nature of our condition here, we must see there is no occasion for such a thing as revealed religion. What is it we want to know? Does not the creation, the universe we behold, preach to us the existence of an almighty power that governs and regulates the whole? And is not the evidence that this creation holds out to our senses infinitly stronger than anything we can read in a book, that any impostor might make and call the word of God? As for morality, the knowledge of it exists in every man's conscience.—Thomas Paine.

Proceedings of the Annual Convention of the Canadian Secular Union.

The annual convention of Canadian Secularists and Freethinkers, under the auspices of the Canadian Secular Union, convened in Science Hall Saturday evening the 14th. A large number of sympathizers were present from various sections of Canada, who came at considerable expense to themselvs to take an activ part in its proceedings.

SATURDAY EVENING.

The president, William Algie, of Alton, proceeded with his annual address. He briefly reviewed the past year and showed that Secularism had made very perceptible progress in Canada, United States, England, France, Germany, Italy, and Australia. The work done by Mr. Watts, Captain Adams, of Montreal, "Alastor," and a few others has been fruitful in good results. He then referred to the controversy now in progress between Catholics and Protestants about the Jesuits' Estates act. The Protestants hav raised the cry of equal rights and hav formed the Equal Rights Association to carry on a warfare against the Catholics on this question. But the orthodox ministers who lead the movement are, in practice, no more in favor of granting equal rights to Catholics and Secularists than the Catholics are to their opponents. He believed in equal rights to all; but this could not be secured by an organization that is managed by any sect of orthodox Christians. He nominated Captain Adams as his successor. The nomination was received with warm demonstrations of approval.

The secretary made his report.

The treasurer made his report.

The secretary read letters from eminent Secularists, and from friends who were unable to attend. From Col. R. G. Ingersoll:

CHARLES WATTS, ESQ, My Dear Friend: I take this occasion to congratulate you on the success of your labors in Canada, and through you all laborers who hav in any way assisted.

People are seeing a little clearer, every day, that the only good, the only sensible, object in life, is happiness, and they are also seeing that happiness is not the result of what is known as belief—that it does not follow from subscribing to a creed, or from the performance of certain ceremonies or the saying of certain prayers.

Whoever is in harmony with the conditions of happiness will be happy. Man must hav food and raiment, he must hav friends, and these can only be obtained by honest labor.

Intelligence ascertains the conditions of well-being, and wisdom livs in accordance with those conditions.

We want to educate the world to the point that passions and prejudices will not disregard the discovery of intelligence, but that man, knowing that his only well-being is in some way dependent upon the well-being of the world, will do what he can, not only for himself, but for others.

I regard knowledge—that is to say science—that is to say intelligence—as the true savior of mankind. So I believe in attending to the affairs of this world—in giving our time, our attention, and our labor, to the accomplishment of some object in our reach—for the attainment of an end that we can understand; and I hail with joy the coming of that time when the world will be fed and clothed, educated and civilized—a world without want and beggary and misery—a world w thout superstition or slavery, without famin and pestilence; and above all, a world without fear.

Again I congratulate you, and the Secularists of Canada, on the great work you hav done. Very truly your friend,

New York, Sept. 12, 1889. R. G. INGERSOLL.

Letters were also received from George Jacob Holyoake, Allen Pringle, G. W. Foote, H. L. Green, W. S. Hutchison, R. Fraser, W. G. Hay, George Maddocks, John Ray, B. L. Chipman, E. Harris, F. Owens, G. Harper, W. Goodman, D. Evans, R. Richards, C. Williamson, O. Watson, J. Greenwood, W. Pearson, D. Bentley, A. Crawford, E. Copeland, J. Jenkins, R. Smith, O. Brown, H. Dudley, L. Warner, F. Perry, B. Lammertine, G. Dowell, P. Riley, Joseph Allaster, W. J. Tucker, and Alfred Roe.

The following special committees were then appointed:

On resolutions.—Messrs. C. Watts, Toronto; T. Littlehales, Hamilton, and J. Harrison, Toronto.

On finance.—Messrs. Wm. Algie, Alton; McClement, Millbrook, and Groom, Meaford.

On new Secular hall in Toronto.—Messrs. D. W. Livingstone, Armstrong, Taylor, and Risser, Toronto.

On provincial propagandism.—Messrs. T. Littlehales, Hamilton; Luval and Harrison, Toronto.

On Secular Thought.—"Alastor," Toronto.

On Secular Sunday-schools.—Mr. Ellis, Toronto; Capt. R. C. Adams, Montreal.

The chairman requested that these committees be ready to report at the meeting in the morning.

The preliminary business having thus been disposed of, speeches were called for. Capt. R. C. Adams made a very happy speech in response to the president's opening address. He would admit the possession of one qualification—a love for the cause. He had so realized the blighting influences of "otherworldliness" that he could work with enthusiasm for "thisworldliness," and he considered the cause of Secularism the noblest to which one could devote his life and energies.

Other speeches were made by Messrs. Groom, Meaford; T. Littlehales, Hamilton, and Charles Watts, Toronto.

SUNDAY MORNING.

The following officers were elected: President, Capt. Robert C. Adams, Montreal; secretary, J. A. Risser, Toronto; treasurer, A. Earsman, Toronto; central executiv committee, William Algie, Alton; T.

Littlehales, Hamilton; J. Harrison, F. Armstrong, G. S. Caldbeck, and John Taylor, Toronto.

Mr. Watts from the committee on resolutions reported, among other resolutions, the following:

SUNDAY CARS IN TORONTO.

Resolved, That in the opinion of the delegates and friends assembled at the convention of the Canadian Secular Union the running of street cars on Sundays in Toronto has become a public necessity. That inasmuch as the running of such cars would not necessarily increase the hours of labor either for the men or horses, we hereby pledge ourselvs to use every legitimate effort to obtain the reform as soon as possible. Be it furthermore resolved, that the executiv of the Toronto Secular Society be instructed by this convention to watch the coming municipal elections in Toronto, with a view of supporting candidates who are in favor of running cars on Sunday.

THE AMERICAN SECULAR UNION.

Resolved, That the proposal of the American Secular Union to offer a premium of $1,000 for a "Manual" for the moral teaching of the young apart from all theology, meets with the unqualified approval of this convention. Furthermore, the Secularists here assembled tender their thanks to Judge R. B. Westbrook, president of the League, for the great interest he has taken in that subject.

COL. R. G. INGERSOLL.

Resolved, That the Canadian Secular Union assembled in convention at Toronto presents to Col. Robert G. Ingersoll a fraternal greeting, and begs to assure that gentleman of the appreciation with which it regards him and his great services to the cause of mental freedom, and it is the unanimous wish of all the delegates present that he makes a special effort to visit Toronto for a lecture or lectures at an early date, as his presence here would invigorate the society as nothing else could. Further, that Capt. R. C. Adams as president of the Canadian Secular Union be requested to forward this resolution with a letter to Colonel Ingersoll.

BRUNO.

Resolved, That this convention recognizes with pleasure as an evidence of the progress of the spirit of freedom, and the emancipation of the human mind from the bondage of clerical and priestly despotism, the recent erection and unveiling of a statue to Bruno in the city of Rome; and this convention repudiates entirely the vindictiv feelings attributed by Cardinal Gibbons to those who hav taken part in carrying out the work, which has been done to perpetuate the memory of one who was willing to sacrifice his life for the cause of mental freedom and individual opinion.

Mr. Littlehales, of the committee on provincial propagandism, reported. He submitted a scheme for utilizing a propagandist fund.

The scheme as reported was thoroughly indorsed by all the speakers. During the discussion the following amounts were promised to the propagandist fund: William Algie, $25; T. Littlehales, $25; G. S. Caldbeck, $5; Captain Adams promised $100 from Montreal. Other promises of support were given, and then further consideration of the matter was postponed till the afternoon session.

Mr. McCutcheon, from Muskoka, entertained the convention with some of his experiences.

AFTERNOON MEETING.

Mr. Livingstone was called upon to read his paper on the proposal to erect a new Secular hall.

Mr. Algie referred to himself as having erected perhaps the first Secular hall in Canada, which he was in hopes would before long pay a fair dividend. A hall should hav been erected in Toronto at the same time, and he advocated it now. He would subscribe for a $100 bond.

Mr. Harrison spoke in favor, and subscribed for a $100 bond.

Mr. Charles Watts suggested the appointment of a special committee to carry out the scheme, to which several persons he knew would subscribe largely. He would take up a $100 bond.

Mr. Risser said it was absolutely necessary to hav a larger hall in the winter season. He knew one friend who would subscribe $500. He would take a $100 bond.

"Alastor" said if the scheme were carried out he would subscribe $100; as also did Mr. Taylor.

Mr. Armstrong approved the scheme, and would subscribe $250.

In all a sum of nearly $1,500 was subscribed for in the room, and the following committee was appointed to put the matter on a legal and business footing, and if possible carry it out: Messrs. Livingstone, Armstrong, Risser, Taylor, Watts, Littlehales, Hay, "Alastor," Harrison, Algie.

"Alastor" was then called upon to read his paper on Secular Thought.

This resolution was carried:

Resolved, While the convention desires to record its pleasure and satisfaction at the improved financial position of Secular Thought, it is of opinion that further steps should be taken at once to increase its circulation in Canada. Be it, therefore, resolved that a special appeal be made to all Secularists throughout the Dominion of Canada to make it his or her personal duty to secure within the next three months as many additional subscribers as possible, and to send the same to the editor of the paper, who shall report the number so obtained and by whom to the executiv of the Canadian Secular Union.

Captain Adams referred to the rapid spread of Freethought opinions which had taken place during the past two or three years as a result of the very able and judicious advocacy of Secular Thought. It found its way weekly into McGill College, where it was often quoted by the students, and into other places where a few years ago nothing of the sort would hav been tolerated, and it would be a disgrace to Canada to allow it to drop.

Mr. Ellis then read his paper on the organization of a Secular Sunday-school.

The president spoke strongly in favor of establishing Sunday-schools. It was necessary to imitate the methods of the churches if we wished to attain similar ends, and in this case we do.

Mr. Algie, while objecting to the name "Sunday-schools," round which some not very pleasant odors were clinging, also strongly advocated them. He thought much greater attention should be given to physical culture for the children. The lesson so distinctly taught in "Under Which Lord?" had still to be learned by the mass of Christians, who neglected this world while looking after the next.

After remarks from several other speakers, Mr. Ellis proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is the duty of Secularists to make special provision for the entertainment and instruction of young people on Sunday, and that this effort should surpass the attractions of the church and Sunday-school; and that a committee be appointed to consider the subject, and if possible carry it out.

This resolution was seconded and carried unanimously, the committee being nominated as follows: Messrs. Ellis, "Alastor," Risser, Caldbeck, Adams, and Algie.

To the same committee was also referred the consideration of the remaining subjects on the program, the formation of classes in science, music, elocution, and debating; and the convention adjourned at a few minutes to 5 o'clock.

EVENING MEETING.

A crowded and enthusiastic meeting assembled in the evening. The chair was taken at half-past 7 o'clock precisely by Mr. Charles Watts, who called upon Mr. Littlehales and his talented family for the first number on the program, a string quartet, which was rendered with excellent taste and was rapturously encored.

Mrs. Chas. Watts then gave a recitation, "On Men." Most charmingly rendered, the recitation excited much mirth.

Mr. Watts then called upon Capt. Robert C. Adams, the newly-elected president of the Union, to deliver the lecture of the evening, the subject being, "Natural Morality." Next week we will giv a synopsis of the captain's lecture.

Mr. Littlehales and his two daughters and son were again called upon by Mr. Watts to favor the audience with another quartet, which, smoothly and artistically rendered, was loudly encored.

Mr. Watts then said it was his duty to bring the day's proceedings to a close. He had been announced to deliver an address on "The Duty of Secularists," but the hour was so late that this must be omitted. The magnificent address they had heard from Captain Adams, however, had covered a good deal of the ground he had intended to go over. He had studied the subject of the various theories of morality. It was commonly said there were at least twenty-four theories. He had reduced them to three, but the captain had reduced them to two—the orthodox and the Secular systems. Captain Adams might perhaps hav shocked some pseudo-moral orthodox people, but he had simply stated the truth in plain and forcible language. The captain, like himself, accepted all the good he could find in Christianity apart from all systems of theology; but he had shown that there is a sufficient basis in natural morality, and we can utilize all this without swallowing the crudities, the absurdities, the contradictions, or the corruptions of the church. Men had always made their own gods, and these must naturally disappear as men advanced in civilization. The state of morality was always highest when the highest principles of truth prevail, and vice versa. Secularists are endeavoring to bring about a state of things wherein a man can neither be immoral nor poor.

Mr. Algie proposed a vote of thanks to Capt. Robert Adams for his brilliant lecture, and to the Littlehales family for their excellent music. This was seconded and carried with cheers, and the meeting closed.

The final business meeting of the convention was then called.

The convention then finally adjourned, the members separating with many expressions of satisfaction at their pleasant reception at the convention, and good wishes for the future.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

Another Pastoral on Bruno.

Archbishop Ryan's pastoral on the Bruno affair was last Sunday read in all the Catholic churches of the archdiocese of Philadelphia and the surrounding country. It directed that special services similar to those ordered by Archbishop Corrigan in New York be held in that archdiocese on Sept. 29th and 30th. A collection for the pope it was announced would also be taken up in all the churches. After reviewing the story of the erection of the monument in Rome to Bruno and giving a short sketch of the martyr's life, the archbishop said:

We do not attempt to justify his punishment; but we point to these facts to show that the insulting ceremony was not an honest tribute to preëminent genius or industrious talent, but a wretched expression of wounded envy at the magnificent tribute paid to the Roman pontiff by the whole world, Catholic, Protestant, Mohammedan, and pagan, on the occasion of the golden jubilee of his priesthood. We do not believe that in his heart the king of Italy sympathized with the demonstration, because the spirit of the men who bowed their heads in veneration of Giordano Bruno is really as anti-royal as it is anti-papal.

But the king is powerless on such occasions. And, it may be asked, if powerless to defend the royal dignity, how could he defend the so-called guarantees offered by his predecessor to preserve the personal and official liberty of the Roman pontiff? We cannot help thinking that it does not become a mighty organization of over two hundred millions of people to look on quietly, to behold their supreme pastor on earth insulted in his capital and restrained in the exercise of his most important functions, and say or do nothing. It is not a question of mere temporal power, but of spiritual independence of another's temporal power. The incident which the pope feels so sensitivly may be repeated in some other form at any time. The laws which condemn all who defend his civil rights are penal persecuting laws, enacted against the pontiff himself. The tendency is to greater persecution, because satanic hatred of religion itself is at the bottom of all. This will not express itself in a Garibaldian shout for liberty and union, but in a quiet, systematic, apparently constitutional mode of warfare.

Now, if the pope has the spiritual power to rule the church of God, he should hav by implication everything essential to the exercise of that spiritual power. If some amount of temporal power and independence of earthly dominion be essential to this freedom, and many good non-Catholic statesmen hav so thought and said, then some such independent position ought to be possessed by the pontiff. He represents too much indirect temporal influence to be subject to any king. The first Napoleon felt that he only needed the pope as a subject to be complete and permanent master of Europe. The pope's present position of neither ruler nor subject is one which cannot be gratifying to either himself or the king of Italy.

The latter must feel that his royal dignity is dwarfed by the presence of the pope—that in the shadow of St. Peter's and the Vatican the Quirinal is utterly lost. But this is not as it should be when proper order prevails. The power of earthly rulers is from God as well as the pontiff's power. "All power is from God," whether pontifical, royal, or republican, and should be respected in its place. Hence, for pope and king the present position is one out of harmony with good order.

What then should be done? To giv such guarantees as Victor Emmanuel offered is clearly folly, as a single vote of the Italian parliament might at any time make the pope a subject. It has sometimes been advanced as a solution of the difficulty that to guarantee these guarantees by European treaty, so that not Italy alone, but all Europe, would be back of them, might giv the pope an independent position even stronger than he possessed before the Garibaldians and Victor Emmanuel robbed him of his possessions. Such a treaty might protect him from any future spoliation. However, Italy has never suggested such guarantee for her guarantees, and would probably resent its suggestion as an intrusion and an insult. Besides this fact, we must remember how treaties in the past hav been disregarded; and now, with the governing powers of European countries half Infidel and anti-papal, it may be doubted whether these powers would enforce, as they should, the guaranteed rights.

The subject is full of difficulty. The solution of the great past has been that the pope should be an independent ruler. It is evidently his own solution. Not that he cares to be the temporal ruler of a petty kingdom for the sake of its little tinseled royalty, when, as pope, he rules the Catholic world. We are sure that he would prefer the pleasures of the Vatican library to those of a royal court. In the ordinary course of human life he is nearing the portals of eternity. But he feels now more than ever that it is due to his sublime office to lift his voice in defense of the liberty of the head of the church of Jesus Christ.

Pope Leo's Prayer to St. Joseph.

TO BE OFFERED DURING OCTOBER, 1889.

To thee, O Blessed Joseph, do we fly in our tribulation, and after imploring the help of thy Most Holy Spouse, we ask confidently for thy protection. We beseech thee by that affection which united thee with the Immaculate Mother of God, and by the paternal love with which thou hast encircled the Child Jesus, and suppliant we pray that thou mayest regard with benignant eye the heritage which Jesus Christ has won by His blood, and that thou mayest aid us in our necessities by thy power and help.

Protect, O Most Provident Guardian of the Divine Family, the elect race of Jesus Christ; banish from us, O most loving Father, all plague of error and corruption; do thou, our strongest support, assist us from the hight of heaven with thy efficacious help in this struggle with the powers of darkness: and, as formerly thou didst rescue the Child Jesus from the greatest danger to His life, so now defend the Holy Church of God from the treachery of her enemies and from all adversity, and cover each one of us with thy lasting protection, so that following thy example and supported by thy help we may be able to liv holily, die piously, and obtain eternal happiness in heaven. Amen!

CATHOLICS hav got so thick about New York city that it is proposed to divide Archbishop Corrigan's diocese and open a new one. That dignitary now has eight hundred thousand under him.

Communications.

"'Tis Strange, 'Tis Passing Strange."

The above words of the immortal bard of Avon never had a more pertinent application or significant meaning than in the reading of Archbishop Corrigan's pastoral letter and the papal allocution of June 30th in all the Catholic churches of the archdiocese of New York, Sunday morning, the 8th inst. The whole thing was one of the most stupendous "giv-aways" of the death-rattle in the throat of the Catholic church in Italy that it is possible to conceive of. Comparing it with secular affairs, what would be thought of the policy and sagacity of a business firm that should rush into print with a doleful tale of the falling off of its trade and of its immediate prospectiv insolvency? It is little that the Roman hierarchy know of human nature, and still less of the weight and influence of the esprit du corps, if this parading of organic weakness and decline is thought to be a recuperativ method for building up and restoring to health and longevity an organization confessedly in such desperate straits as this acknowledgment announces. When Rome was besieged by the Gauls under Brennus, to show the invaders the futility of attempting to starve the garrison into capitulating the plucky Romans threw loaves into the enemy's camp. Here was not only strategy but defiance—a combination of logic that carried a double weight of conviction to those addressed.

It may be announced for sensational effect that Germany and Austria admonish Italy to "go slow" in its treatment of the pope, still, for all of that, time will show that Italy will take no backward steps in dealing with its venerable valetudinarian. The end is bound to come, and it will come, too, with the connivance of these very powers, who may outwardly affect concern and commiseration for the pope.

If there is one thing which the conclave which liv at the Vatican know better than another, it is that Catholicism in Europe is dead, and that the blare of no archangel's trump can ever again awake it to resurrection. Its presence is an anachronism and stench to the eve of the nineteenth century. America is the last camping-ground, and superhuman and frenzied efforts will be made here to "hold the fort." And apparently it looks as though success would crown the attempt; but don't be too sure. When confidence becomes overweening—when toleration for political reasons is construed into indifference if not friendship—then presumption will prompt the fatal step that will arouse the country as with a whirlwind, and Catholicism, if not hurled from the land, will be taught that a longer lease of life upon this free and favored soil is conditional upon keeping "hands off" from anything and everything looking to civil and political supremacy and aggrandizement.

As with the Indian race, which no friction with white society can effectually civilize, so with the church of Rome, which has immemorially gloated in the arrogance of self-imposed assumption and fattened on the extortions wrung from bigotry, credulity, and superstition, the ruling passion lasts till death—even then, in which it fails to realize its doom, and that its former power is a thing of the past. That there is nothing good and redeeming in the Catholic church it would be disingenuous and unjust to say. Still, the glaring, overshadowing, menacing fact remains that its desperate, mad resolve and ambition is to get its clutches upon the entire social, political, and religious fabric of this nation and people. To "let liv" is no tenet of its grasping, domineering policy. Rule or ruin—aut Cæsar aut nullus. Yet it would better giv heed to the "ides of March." My hostility to the Catholic church is not from fear that it will ultimately sway the destinies of America, but from its arrogant presumption in claiming a division of the school fund for parochial schools. When we consider that in Catholic France, Italy, Austria, and even priest-ridden Spain, it has lost all but the shadow of its former influence and power, we need not apprehend anything worse here than the spasmodic throes of its death struggle, and measurably by the same laws of disintegration by which Protestantism is weakening and fading out will Catholicism yield to the marasmus of its inevitable fate.

Goings-On in Massachusetts.

To The Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: It is very many months since I hav talked with your readers, and I begin to fear, if the silence continues much longer, I shall be forgotten, and so with your permission I will attempt a short letter.

I returned to my home one week ago, after an absence of three months, spent in Massachusetts—dear old Massachusetts! how I hav loved it! my own home and the home of my ancestors away back to the Mayflower—but I hav come to the conclusion that it is high time to wean myself, as New York can not more than equal the Bay State in bigotry. One of the Presbyterian clergymen in a town only thirty miles from Boston announced to his hearers one Sunday morning that coming from his home he saw men at work in the hay-field, and he wondered God did not strike them dead for breaking the Fourth Commandment. Why did he not fear to get his horse ready and drive some three or four miles to preach, and thereby earn his daily bread? Consistency, thou art indeed hard to find! No doubt our president and postmaster-general break the Fourth Commandment in many respects on each returning Sunday, but as they happen to be in power just now, they make much of their opportunity to oppress the people who thoughtlessly and foolishly gave them the power. I want to remind all Freethinkers who helped to elect the present administration, that they cannot expect a free government until they learn that the men at the head of government must not be Christians.

Of course your readers know of the "new party," the Nationalists, or rather the old party the Socialists revised and improved, with Edward Bellamy and his wonderful book, "Looking Backward," at the head. I know there is a good deal in the book that seems visionary to-day, but it is good to know that there is one man in Massachusetts that has thought upon the subject of our present civilization and to what it tends, enough to write the book, and that a numerous company, some even of the "old reformers of long ago," are awake, and thinking and writing upon the all-important question, What shall we do to be saved from degrading poverty? They hav at last discovered that none of the Gods are of avail.

There is an article in the Nationalist, written by Arthur Hildreth, upon the question of supplying the gas to the cities and towns of the state, that for good sense, under cover of the keenest humor, is not often excelled. I hope the editor of Freethought will see it and enjoy it. It is good sometimes to laugh, if one could only find anything to laugh at.

While in Boston I called to see our good old friend Photius Fiske. He looked feeble, and worn, but shall we do without him? I know no one who is so profuse in his charities, and who never givs to be seen of men. "Of such is the kingdom of heaven" that is to be.

Of the funeral of Mr. Seaver your readers hav been well informed; the touching and well-deserved eulogy has been given them entire; but beautiful as are the written words of Colonel Ingersoll, you lose the magnetism of his voice, his splendid presence, which is not easily described—one must hear him to get a full understanding of him. I would like to say something of Mr. Seaver, but what word of mine could do him justice? True to himself, he lived his thought and died triumphantly. How his lifelong friend, Mr. Mendum, must miss him! Their love was like the love of "David and Jonathan," or "Damon and Pythias." Will Mr. Mendum accept our warmest sympathy.

I hav spoken of the Nationalist as a new party. Now let me say that I am not only glad of them, but I am glad of their opposits, the Anarchists. They also rouse thought. I had a most delightful visit with some of them in their home in Revere, and as I looked into their faces and heard their tender words of the poor of this hard world, I was reminded of the saying of Mrs. Chapman of Boston, who was one of the earliest and most effisient Abolitionists in the days of that terrible epidemic, negrophobia. Said Mrs. Chapman: "I would cure anyone of the disease by putting him in the parlor with Frederick Douglass for an afternoon." So I would cure even the most bitter banker by putting him where he should make the acquaintance of such people as the Sihums, the Yarros, the Tiltons, Holmes, and others of the Boston Anarchists. I do not mean that they would be converted to their ideas, but they would credit them with trying to help the world.

I must not close without saying that I visited on my way home the Geigers in their beautiful home in Hudson. They hav hearts full of hospitality, and their home is ample to carry out all their heart's desire. Blessing on them all—father, mother, sons, and daughters. They are all Liberals, such as one of my age knows how to appreciate, aye, and love. We talked of the coming Congress in Philadelphia, and of its needs. Alas, that we are so few! The Geigers will be there, sure. Lucy N. Colman.

Traveling and Lecturing.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Hay Springs, Neb., is one of the many new towns springing into life, with a fine brick school building, two stories high, four large rooms, three teachers, and many bright children. The village is made up of prospering people for the most part. The town is situated on the Fremont, Elkhorn & Missouri River railroad, in Sheridan county. The climate is salubrious; soil light-colored, but rich; the country slightly rolling, but generally level.

There again! I hav forgotten to mention that there are two quite good-looking buildings dedicated to a. g. Yesterday (Lord's day), in company with E. W. Miner, I attended d. s., while friends Chappell and Tripp, both Liberals, walked into the Methodist Episcopal church and listened to a reading of one of Talmage's old sermons, in view of the fact that the preacher had not time to prepare a better one himself.

Through the press, by some mistake, I was advertised to lecture in the Congregational church. The minister announced from the pulpit that "to allow Mr. Jamieson to use the church to promulgate so-called Freethought would be inconsistent" from his standpoint. The preacher proceeded to speak favorable words in behalf of Freethought: "I am a Freethinker myself, I am a Christian, not because my father and mother were Christians, but because of my own reasoning." That's progress! It appears as if Freethinking is becoming popular; but what kind of a Freethinker can a Christian be? "Believe or be damned." Wonderful Freethinking! This clergyman in his prayer let slip the expression: "Helpless, hell-deserving creatures; no good in us." If we deserve hell, we deserve to get it.

I frequently attend church while engaged in my travels, to note progress and the reverse, but very seldom do the clergy return my visits. In the afternoon the Liberals assembled, a small audience; a little larger in the evening. Three more lectures are to be given, and then to other fields. My address until further notice is Hay Springs, Neb. The few Liberals here are an earnest little band. Henry Mattley, Alcove, is, he says, a convert of mine, as a result of my lectures in Kirksville, Mo., eleven years ago. Now he is one of the most aggressiv, intelligent, go-ahead Freethinkers in this whole country, and is ably engineering arrangements for my present series, including a subscription paper.

E. W. Miner formerly was secretary of Axtell Secular Union, Kansas. He came to this country a few months ago, and in business is succeeding admirably; at the same time he is open and candid in his avowals, and his wife is equally outspoken.

Besides those already mentioned are Thomas Edwards (a lawyer), Messrs. Belding and wife, Cleveland and wife, Mrs. Miner, Mrs. Mattley, Mrs. Chappell, Mrs. Tripp (daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Chappell), Messrs. Reed, Waterman, Judge Magoon, Cherrington, C. W. Phillips, Walter Sterling, Archie Sterling, De Puy, all of Hay Springs; S. B. Pitcher, Sheriff Rosencrans, W. H. Westover, Meservy, W. A. Parker and wife, E. W. Truitt, G. F. Shephard Rushville.

Death.

Lord Bacon said: "It is as natural to die as to be born; and to a little infant, perhaps, the one is as painful as the other. He that dies in an earnest pursuit, is like one that is wounded in hot blood, who, for the time, scarce feels the hurt; and therefore a mind fixed and bent upon somewhat that is good, doth avert the dolors of death. But, above all, believe it, the sweetest canticle is Nunc dimittas,* when a man hath obtained worthy ends and expectations. Death hath this also, that it openeth the gate to good fame and extinguisheth envy." Burr.

* These were the last words of Thomas Jefferson. A few moments before his death he said, "I hav done for my country and for all mankind all that I could do, and I now resign my soul without fear to my God, my daughter to my country." Soon afterward he repeated indistinctly his favorit ejaculation, Nunc dimittas, Domine, Nunc dimittas, Domine, and died.

Bruno.

From the New York Evening Post.

The Italians hav done a grand thing in erecting on the spot where he was burnt alive by the papal Inquisition in Rome, a statue to Giordano Bruno, one of the precursors of modern intellectual freedom, and one of the noblest products of the Italian soil, that fruitful mother of great men. He predicted in his last moments, after years of imprisonment, the rehabilitation of his memory through the triumph of his ideas, and his countrymen hav only done one of their most solemn duties in making provision for the perpetual remembrance of his martyrdom. They are finding full justification, if they needed any, in the furious denunciations of them, first by the pope and then by the Catholic bishops, who are pouring torrents of their peculiar ecclesiastical vituperation on the memory of the murdered philosopher, who was, according both to Cardinal Gibbons and his brother of Montreal, Archbishop Fabre, "an enemy of God and virtue, a man without doctrin or morals, whose revolting crimes brought him under the condemnation of ecclesiastical and civil laws." Yes, and if Archbishop Fabre and his kind had their way to-day, there is hardly a man eminent in science or literature or philosophy who would not be "an enemy of God and virtue, a man without doctrin or morals," ripe for their gibbet and their stake. But, thanks to the Brunos of the world, we hav clipped their claws, and made their sentences all "sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Selected.

Women and Christianity.

From the London Contemporary Review.

It is a prevalent opinion that woman owes her present high position to Christianity, and the influences of the Teutonic mind. I used to believe this opinion, but in the first three centuries I hav not been able to see that Christianity had any favorable effect on the position of women, but, on the contrary, that it tended to lower their character and contract the range of their activity. . . .

It is when we come to the writings of St. Paul that opinions are pronounced in regard to marriage and the conduct of women, and there can be no doubt that these opinions are of a stern and restrictiv nature. The Ebionites explained the apostle's conversion by stating that he was, as he himself allowed, a nativ of Tarsus, that he was not a Jew, but a Greek with a Greek father and a Greek mother, that he went up to Jerusalem and stayed there for some time, that he fell in love with the high priest's daughter, became in consequence a proselyte and asked her in marriage, but on being refused he was enraged, and wrote against circumcision, the Sabbath, and the law. Some hav thought that there is a bitterness against women in the writings of St. Paul which can be explained only by some such rejection as that related by the Ebionites. His words had a great influence on the formation of opinion in regard to women in the ancient church. They fell in with the tendencies of the times, and were made the groundwork and support of the depreciation of marriage, which became prevalent in the third and fourth centuries.

The entire exclusion of women from every sacred function stands in striking contrast with both heathen and heretical practice. In Rome the wife of Pontifex Maximus took the lead in the worship of Bona Dea, and in the religious rites which specially concerned women. The most honored priest attached to a particular god in Rome, the flamen dialis, must be married, and must resign his office when his wife died, for his wife was also a priestess, and his family were consecrated to the service of the god. And the vestal virgins received every mark of respect that could be bestowed on them, and the amplest liberty. The highest officials made way for them as they passed along the streets, they banqueted with the College of Pontifices, they viewed the games in the company of the empress, and statues were erected in their honor. The same respect is accorded to women by many of the heretical Christians. Nearly every founder of a sect has a woman to aid him. Simon Magnus has his Helene, Montanus his Maximilla, Apelles his Philumene, and so in the case of other sects. One sect deserves special notice for the energy with which it supported the claims of women. It bore various names, such as the Quintilliani, the Pepuziani, the Priscilliani, and the Bread-and-Cheesites, because they celebrated their mysteries with bread and cheese. They gave special thanks to Eve because she first ate of the tree of knowledge. They celebrated the sister of Moses and the four daughters of Philip, because they asserted the right of women to prophesy, that is, to speak in public the message of God. Frequently in their church seven virgins, clothed in white and bearing torches, stood up and addressed the people, and spoke so eloquently that tears of repentance ran down the cheeks of the audience. In this sect women held the place of bishops and elders and deacons as well as men, and they appealed to St. Paul for their practice, for he says, "In Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female." It is against this sect that Tertullian, or one assuming his name, launches his thunderbolts. "The very women," he says, "of these heretics, how wanton they are! For they are bold enough to teach, to dispute, to enact exorcisms, to undertake cures, it may be even to baptize."

Such, then, was the position which woman occupied in the church in the course of the first three centuries of Christianity. The highest post to which she rose was to be a doorkeeper and a message woman, and even these functions were taken away from her during the Middle Ages.

In the days of the first fervor the Christian brethren set up a plan of voluntary Socialism, and wished to hav all thi gs in common; but the plan did not work, and they had recourse to a systematic relief of the poor. One feature of this relief was what were called love feasts. It was not unusual in ancient times for large bodies of men to dine together, and large dinner parties were often made up by each man bringing his contribution to the feast. With some such idea as this the Christians met, men and women together, the rich bringing the supplies, and they all dined together. Probably they did this every day at the earliest period, and some think that these meals constituted the celebration of what is called the Lord's Supper. The love feasts were unquestionably associated with this institution, but in the course of time they became less frequent, and generally took place after the administration of the Eucharist. They continued till the fifth century, at least, and were often held in the churches, after churches were erected. These dinners were not always scenes of perfect propriety, as St. Paul's First Epistle to the Corinthians shows, and on some occasions intoxication and riotousness prevailed. These feasts went by the name of Loves, or love feasts, as we now translate the word. We need not wonder that pagans should suspect that the Loves were not of the purest.

There is a commandment five times repeated in the apostolic epistles, and indicativ of the strong bond of brotherhood which bound Christian brothers and sisters to each other, to this effect: "Salute the brethren with a holy kiss," St. Peter varying the command, "Salute the brethren with a kiss of ove." It is likely that at first this kiss was imparted at every meeting, but gradually it became limited to the great sacramental occasions, such as baptism and the Eucharist. At first, too, and for a considerable time, the Christian brothers and sisters kissed each other. It is easy to see that such a practice would giv rise to scandalous reports, and there is evidence in the ecclesiastical writers that the early Christians did not always make it a holy kiss, as it should hav been. Athenagoras quotes a saying which he attributes to our Lord, and which evidently deals with an abuse of this practice. It is to this effect: "Whoever kisses a second time, because he has found pleasure in it, commits a sin." And Clement of Alexandria thus speaks of the matter: "Love is not tested by a kiss; but by kindly feeling. But there are those that do nothing but make the churches resound with a kiss. For this very thing, the shameless use of the kiss, which ought to be mystic, occasions foul suspicions and evil reports."

From a very early date two currents can be traced in the church—one in the direction of upholding marriage, another in that of despising and rejecting it. No one with the New Testament as his guide could venture to assert that marriage was wrong, and the tradition remained firm in the church during the ante-Nicene period that it was unlawful and heretical to forbid marriage. The apostolic fathers offer exhortations to wives to love their own husbands truly, and to love all others with no partiality for anyone and in all chastity, and to train up their children in the knowledge and fear of God. As time moves on such exhortations become less frequent, but still marriage is held up as a modified blessing.

But it is easy to see that the mind could not halt in this position. Marriage, even for the sake of children, was a carnal indulgence, and such thinkers could not help feeling that the arrangement of the creator was not altogether satisfactory. They did not venture on saying this. They did not dare to condemn marriage. But they held that it was much better not to marry at all, that the man or woman who had never married, but remained pure, was a nobler and more exalted being than the man or woman who had married. "For the world," says Methodius, "while still unfilled with men, was like a child, and it was necessary that it should first be filled with these, and so grow to manhood. But when hereafter it was colonized from end to end, the race of man spreading to a boundless extent, God no longer allowed man to remain in the same ways, considering how they might now proceed from one point to another and advance nearer to heaven, until, having attained to the very greatest and most exalted lesson of virginity, they should reach to perfection; that first they should abandon the intermarriage of brothers and sisters and marry wives from other families, and then that they no longer should hav many wives, like brute beasts, as though born for the mere propagation of the species, and then that they should not be adulterers, and then that they should go on to continence, and from continence to virginity, when, having trained themselvs to despise the flesh, they sail fearlessly into the peaceful haven of immortality." Marriage, according to this writer, was not abolished by Christ, but it was a state of inferiority. "For I think," he makes a virgin say, "I hav gathered clearly from the scriptures that after the word had brought in virginity, he did not altogether abolish the generation of children; for though the moon may be greater than the stars, the light of the other stars is not destroyed by the moonlight." There thus arose the gradation of virgins, widows, and wives. Tertullian speaks of wives as women of the second degree of modesty who hav fallen into wedlock.

This antagonism to marriage had a great influence on family life. It is strange how seldom children are mentioned in the Christian writings of the second and third centuries. Almost nothing is said of their training; no efforts are mentioned as being made for their instruction. The Christians had come to the belief that the world had enough of children, and was fully stocked, and that every birth was a cause of sorrow and not of joy. One writer interprets the wail of the infant as he enters the world thus: "Why, O mother, didst thou bring me forth to this life, in which prolongation of life is progress to death? Why hast thou brought me into this troubled world, in which, on being born, swaddling bands are my first experience? Why hast thou delivered me to such a life as this, in which a pitiable youth wastes away before old age, and old age is shunned as under the doom of death? Dreadful, O mother, is the course of life which has death as the goal of the runner. Bitter is the road of life we travel, with the grave as the wayfarer's inn." Tertullian says: "Further reasons for marriage which men allege for themselvs arise from anxiety for posterity, and the bitter, bitter pleasure of children. To us this is idle. For why should we be eager to bear children, whom, when we hav them, we desire to send before us to glory (in respect, I mean, of the distresses that are now imminent); desirous as we are ourselvs to be taken out of this most wicked world and received into the Lord's presence." He describes children as "burdens which are to us most of all unsuitable, as being perilous to faith." And again: "Let the well-known burdensomeness of children, especially in our case, suffice to counsel widowhood—children whom men are compelled by laws to hav, because no wise man would ever willingly hav desired sons." And he exclaims: "A Christian forsooth will seek heirs, disinherited as he is from the entire world."

This is the way in which Tertullian addresses women: "Do you not know that each one of you is an Eve? The sentence of God on this sex of yours livs in this age; the guilt must of necessity liv, too. You are the devil's gateway; you are the unsealer of that forbidden tree; you are the first deserter of the divine law; you are she who persuaded him whom the devil was not valiant enough to attack. You destroyed so easily God's image, man. On account of your desert, that is, death, even the son of God had to die." And the gentle Clement of Alexandria hits her hard when he says: "Nothing disgraceful is proper for man, who is endowed with reason; much less for woman, to whom it brings shame even to reflect of what nature she is." Gregory Thaumaturgus asserts: "Moreover, among all women I sought for chastity proper to them, and I found it in none. And verily, a person may find one man chaste among a thousand, but a woman never." The testament of the Twelve Patriarchs makes a similar statement, and adds: "By means of their adornment they deceive first the minds of men, and they instil poison by the glance of their eye, and then they take them captiv by their doings," and therefore "men should guard their senses against every woman." "The angel of God showed me," it says in another passage, "that forever do women bear rule over king and beggar alike; and from the king they take away his glory, and from the valiant man his strength, and from the beggar even that little which is the stay of his poverty." How, then, were men to treat this frivolous, dress-loving, lust-inspiring creature? Surely the best plan was to shut her up. Her clear duty was to stay at home, and not let herself be seen anywhere. And this the Christian writers impress upon her again and again.

"Natural grace," says Tertullian, "must be obliterated by concealment and negligence, as being dangerous to the glances of the beholder's eyes." Then she must clothe herself from head to foot. In speaking of her going to church, Clement of Alexandria says: "Let her be entirely covered, unless she happen to be at home. For that style of dress is grave and protects from being gazed at. And she will never fall who puts before her face modesty and her shawl; nor will she invite another to fall into sin by uncovering her face. For this is the wish of the word, since it is becoming for her to pray veiled."

The ascetic tendency repressed the growth of population. It had also a deteriorating effect on posterity. The less spiritual classes of the people, the laymen, being taught that marriage might be licentious, and that it implied an inferior state of sanctity, were rather inclined to neglect matrimony for more loose connections, and it was these persons alone that then peopled the world. It was the survival of the unfittest. The noble men and women, on the other hand, who were dominated by the loftiest aspirations, and exhibited the greatest temperance, self-control, and virtue, left no children. During this period there is a striking absence of home life in the history of Christians. No son succeeds his father, no wife comforts the wearied student, no daughter soothes the sorrow of the aged bishop. Perhaps this absence of domestic affection, this deficiency in healthy and vigorous offspring, this homelessness, may account in some degree for the striking features of the next century, and especially the prevalent hardness of heart. Then men disputed with the utmost bitterness and ferocity about minute points of doctrin which are now incomprehensible almost to everyone, and matters of absolute indifference to this generation, and they pronounced sentence of eternal damnation without the slightest compunction on all who differed from them. Then treatises were written to show why every heretic should be put to death in this life and tortured eternally in the life to come. And there is scarcely a champion of the faith, orthodox or heterodox, who was not accused of fearful crimes.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

Faith Cure.

Another death has been caused by the Christian religion. Of course, that religion causes an almost countless number of deaths every week, directly or indirectly. But we now refer to one death of which it is so clearly and undeniably the cause that all allow its guilt.

Carl Olsen, of Norwegian birth, livs at 205 Sackett street, Brooklyn. He is one of the leaders of a band of faith cure believers, and one of the founders of a Christian Mission at 155 Hamilton avenue. At a revival at Temperance Hall, Brooklyn, he made the acquaintance of Miss Martha Olsen, who had come from Norway not long ago, and was employed as a domestic. The coincidence in their names struck them, and they became friends. About three weeks ago the girl came to the house of her friend ill, and accepted the invitation of him and his wife to remain till well. All these persons and their friends believed in faith cure. They were all warm Christians, and attended church Tuesday and Thursday evenings and twice on Sunday. They called no doctor, nor did the girl want any. "It will do no good," she said, "to hav a doctor. I am in the hands of the Lord, and if he sees fit to take me I'll not interfere." The girl was treated with ice and incantations. She continued to grow worse. Several neighbors called and urged her to get a doctor, but she persistently refused. Her brother, who is her only relativ in this country, called and urged her to let him send a physician, but without avail. Finally at an alarming sinking of the girl a police surgeon, Dr. A. W. Ford, was called. He said she had typhoid fever, and left a prescription. The prescription was not filled. On the 12th the girl died. Dr. Ford refused to giv a death certificate. He said: "As soon as I saw the girl on Monday I concluded that she had typhoid fever, but the symptoms were not especially alarming. I left a prescription to hav put up, and also directed how the medicin was to be used. The next I heard of the case was last night, when I was hurriedly called to the house. I found the girl dead. I was surprised to learn they had not only not given the medicin I had ordered, but had not even had the prescription put up. The girl, I think, died of their neglect. There is no doubt about it. The only thing these people did was to nurse her and perform their hellish incantations over her, waving their hands over her, patting her on the body, and praying for her recovery. These people should be taken charge of and a stop put to their outrageous ceremonies." The doctor made a formal complaint to Coroner Rooney, especially against Carl Olsen for neglecting to carry out his instructions about the prescription. Olsen was arrested while praying over the dead body.

At the coroner's inquest that official was courteously received, and as the people who had surrounded the girl's deathbed seemed intelligent, he could not understand why they had not secured medical attendance until they began to urge him to giv his soul to the Lord. Then he realized the situation, lost all patience, and severely censured them for neglecting to call a physician. His remarks, however, made no impression. They told him that he was substantially a heathen and an enemy of Christ.

Dr. Ford testified that, in his opinion, the girl died of neglect. Proper medical remedies and proper nourishment were not obtained for her. On his second visit he found fifteen or sixteen women and one man in the room with the corpse. They told him that all that was necessary in cases of sickness was prayer, and that if he would stay they would pray for him.

Dr. Shepard said that the girl would hav recovered with proper treatment.

William Olsen, a brother of the girl, testified that he went to see his sister twice during her illness. She had been sick a week or so the first time he called. He had always treated her very kindly, and he asked her why she did not come to his house when she was taken sick. She replied that his house was not holy enough for her. She was a zealous believer in the faith cure. "Martha would hav been alive today if she had not become acquainted with this family," said the brother sadly. "She had come to believe in faith cure or Christian science herself, but we would hav saved her life if the Olsens had not prevented. Five times I called to see her during her illness, and when I said I would get a doctor, they would tell me, 'You are a child of the devil. The Lord is our protector.'"

Mrs. Olsen, the wife of the preceding witness, testified that she visited her sister-in-law five or six times, and each time urged her to hav a physician, but the girl refused to hav one called, saying that he could do her no good. When the witness asked her why she did not come to her house, the girl said: "It is not Christ's house." Mrs. Olsen, the wife of Carl L. Olsen, said to her: "Jesus made Martha sick, and will take care of her."

Coroner Rooney asked Mr. Olsen if he would wait for the intervention of divine providence if he saw a man drowning and it was in his power to save him. Olsen said: "I hav no faith in physicians myself. This young woman had none and I didn't care to interfere." The coroner asked: "If you had typhoid fever yourself would you hav sent for a physician?" Olsen answered: "I would not." "In case you were to fall and break your leg, would you send for one?" "I think if I were to break my leg I would get a doctor." Olsen frequently went, he said, to religious meetings at Hamilton avenue. At these meetings no decision was made not to call physicians, but some one would read a passage from the Bible, in which they all believed, and then there would be prayer and singing. It was learned that an infant child of Olsen's was taken sick about a year ago, and died. It is claimed that Olsen knew of his child's danger, but failed to summon medical aid, saying that he did not believe in medicin.

Olsen is contented in his cell. He says he does not fear punishment, as he is in the Lord's care. To one reporter he said: "I hav nothing to fear, for the Lord will acquit me." To another reporter he stated: "I and all the members of my family hav no faith in the power of physicians to cure bodily ills. We believe that when our time comes we must die, and that no earthly help will avail. This girl knew she was going to die, and was perfectly resigned to her fate. I would not attempt to save a life that was to be claimed by its maker."

A reporter called at the house. The dead woman's coffin was surrounded by the members of the Christian Mission, of which she was a member. Scattered in unusual profusion on tables about the room were Bibles. He thus describes his visit:

"A dozen women were talking in a foreign language in an adjoining room, and a young man, who said his name was Jacob Andrew Johnson, mistook the interest I showed in his remarks for penitence of soul, and fluently expounded the gospel from his peculiar standpoint. He assured me that the dead girl had refused to touch her lips to any drug while she was sensible, and that by her own request they had sought no medical advice. A pretty young woman of twenty years clasped her hands upon her breast, and, with a rapt expression, declared that she envied her sister Martha, who had died in the faith. After exhorting me to separate myself from the world and its follies, she further announced her regret that she had never been a martyr.

"'Don't you believe,' said Jacob A. Johnson, with an approving glance, not wholly free from admiration, at the fair enthusiast, 'that the Lord has fixed a time when each of us must die, and all the medicins on earth cannot save us when that time comes? He holds us like this,' lifting up his thumb and forefinger, 'just as I would hold a sparrow. The only thing we can do is to pray.'

"'Did you pray for Martha?' I inquired.

"'Whenever the spirit moved us,' was the reply.

"Jacob said that he had suffered from typhoid fever and had recovered without medicin."

To our mind, the most striking thing about the whole matter is the public opinion against this use of faith, when the very people who express that opinion profess to be believers in a book that directs this use of faith most explicitly. If anything is clear in the account of Christ, it is clear that he both practiced and commanded such treatment of the sick. If the passages recording this are not true, how can it be said that any passages are true?

Faith is of the very essence of the Christian religion, yet here is a public calling itself Christian assailing it in all the vocabulary of abuse, and imprisoning those who try to use it. This public should not call itself Christian any longer. During the dozen or fifteen preceding centuries people were Christians in reality, and they used nothing but faith. Then all was the reverse. Physicians were imprisoned as Atheists, sorcerers, and leaguers with the devil, while incantations of priests were used in every case. All our papers now clamor for Olsen's punishment vociferously. Says one:

"The unalienable right of a man to be as big a fool as he pleases is subject to certain limitations, and the case of Carl M. Olsen, of Brooklyn, affords the courts an opportunity to decide precisely what those limitations are."

We do not think the opinion of this paper as to just where these limitations should be set is worth much. The paper probably thinks it has reasoned the matter all out itself and judged how it should be decided. It has done nothing of the kind. It simply reflects the opinion of the masses. If the paper had been published a few centuries ago, it would hav thought there should be either no limitations to faith foolishness, or limitations very slight. Now it thinks they should be set so as to prevent its exercise in cases of illness, but no doubt would approve of its exercise in other classes of cases. It d sapproves of faith in the department of medicin, but of course thinks it all right in the departments of historical inquiry, government, and morals. The only reason it has got so far as to disapprove its use in one department is that Rationalists hav beat into the people a little doubt of its efficacy in that department. The only way in which the paper will ever come to disapprove its use in other departments will be by Rationalists beating into the people doubt of its efficacy in those other departments. Neither this paper quoted, nor anything calling itself in the faintest degree Christian, has the least capacity to pass a judgment on the matter. The only one fit to judge, and that ever has judged, is the Freethinker. It is he that has effected every bit of the diminution of trust in faith that has been effected. It is he that is the sole cause of the public's passing such judgments as it passes now. It is he that has brought the people to where they are, it is he that keeps them from falling back into the mire of insanity again, it is he that is our only hope and dependence for drawing them ahead further into the ages of complete sanity and pure reason of the future.

More of the same sort of talk appears in the World:

"It is held by lawyers, we believe, that the statutes do not apply technically to faith curers because those people administer no medicin. If that is true the legislature at its next session should so amend the law as to make it apply. Homicides through ignorance and blind credulity are not made better by the fact that those who commit them are sincere fools, and the treatment of disease by incantation is as contrary to public policy and as dangerous to life as the ignorant administration of medicin could be. It is time to put a stop to it."

"It is time to put a stop to"—what? Why not to put a stop to the treatment of governmental and moral affairs "by incantation" as well as treatment of disease in that way? Why dismiss the use of incantation in disease and retain its use in such forms as the supposed making of people moral by mumbling mystic formulas and sprinkling them with some conjuring stuff or other at church enrolments? If we can cure disease better by science than by faith, can we not find out how to promote morality better by scientific inquiry into morals than by faith in an ancient scrap-book kept by barbarians? If the offering of prayers in illness is so foolish that it would be outrageous to tax us all to pay for somebody's offering them, is not the offering of prayers for the prosperity of our public legislatures and our nation so foolish that it is outrageous to tax us all to pay for them? If it would be wrong to draw from us by taxes the money to support the prayer-offering done by these faith healers, is it not wrong to draw from us by taxes the money to support any prayer-offering done by anyone at all?

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

The Pope.

The situation of this God on earth continues to increase in perplexity and unsafety.

One of the latest troubles made for him is in the schools of Rome. Formerly he and his subordinates ran everything connected with schooling, and passed pupils regardless of their attainments if they only had a plenty of piety. Now, however, the government has by its accurate and valuable examinations raised into influence a different set of principles. The government examins all applicants for situations under it, and not being influenced or coerced as of old, rejects whatever applicant is backward in educational acquirements regardless of how many monkish legends he may hav in his pate or how willing he is to hand his gold over to support priests. The Catholics describe the conductors of the examination as "Jews and an apostate priest." "Woe," they exclaim, "to the lads who are known to come from a clerical school or college!" They hav espoused the cause of several boys who hav been thus sent back, and say they will agitate their grievance in parliament. The object, they allege, is to deter parents from sending their sons to clerical establishments.

Then a demonstration in honor of Premier Crispi has been held at Naples. This cannot but be discouraging to the enemies of this admirable and fearless Freethinking statesman. They will call it an "outrage." Twenty thousand impious admirers of this "enemy of God" marched in procession to his villa. In the number were members of the municipal government and of the senate and chamber of deputies. On this man the American Catholic News says:

"This corrupt man is the only shrewd statesman Italy now possesses. Papal action with governments is hampered by his malicious intrigues. He is the greatest enemy of the pope, and still he is the pope's jailer, the European powers having relinquished to Italy the guardianship of the pope. What can be expected from such guardians? To-day they are obliged to respect the pope and to leave him the Vatican and its garden. To-morrow they will or can expel him out of the Vatican under some pretext. The pope in his actual condition is at the mercy of the worst enemies of the papacy."

In an encyclical letter just issued Leo expresses himself as having lost every human hope and trusting only in God's providence and in "the powerful intercession first of our Blessed Virgin, then of the great protector of the church, St. Joseph." Prayers for the safety of him and of the church are by direction being offered in the churches all over the world, here in the United States as elsewhere. We do not care how much supernatural help they get. We do not care how much supernatural aid they bring in if they refrain from calling up the natural aid of bloody-minded soldiers with hard steel, as of old. As to their St. Joseph, and all their supernatural friends of every stripe, we do not mind them, having been used to fighting against these parties for many years. Here are some touching and beautiful sentiments on the matter, from a Catholic organ:

"His holiness puts all his confidence in God alone; he does not pay much attention to what is done around him. He knows that God will not leave his church in the hands of its enemies for a long time, and for a trial too great to bear. He leaves the cause of the papacy in the hands of God the almighty."

We wish he would leave the money he is continually wheedling out of his dupes' pockets all over the world in the hands of God the almighty too.

A Roman Catholic writes from the scene of conflict:

"The Vatican is now formally besieged with guards and policemen of all kinds, with detectivs and soldiers in private dress, having carriages at their disposal, so that nobody can enter or leave the Vatican without the knowledge of the Italian government. This position is embarrassing for the pope, who nevertheless does not wish to leave the Vatican, unless compelled by force of circumstances, such as would arise in the event of war. But nevertheless he is now a prisoner under guard and watched by detectivs. I know the Vatican has made an appeal to the powers on this account; Italy's answer was evasiv and declared that what was done was simply for the protection of the pope himself. Of course this is not true. The aim of Signor Crispi in besieging the Vatican is to take possession of it at once, as soon as the pope leaves. Under Italian law only the person of the pope, it is said, is to be respected, not the cardinals and prelates living at the Vatican."

Austria, Germany, Spain, and France are the countries with whom the Vatican is now intriguing the most, to secure promis of armed aid against struggling Freethought and religious liberty. It is uncertain whether the aid of any one of these nations can be procured. It is, to be sure, reported that the emperor of Austria has declared a visit of his to Italy to be "contingent upon the Italian government modifying its policy toward the church, refraining from interfering with the privileges of the officers of the Vatican, suppressing demonstrations similar to the Bruno celebration, and a renewal of the pledges to observe the law guarantees." But other reports represent his warmth in the cause to be much less. Cable reports are uncertain and often ill-grounded. The same is to be said of the news that Prince Bismarck charged Herr Schloezer, who recently went to Friedrichruhe, to inform the pope on his return to Rome that Italy's allies would constrain the Quirinal to respect the wishes of the Vatican. It is not certain that this is so. Austria is the most likely of the four to assist; Germany has a Protestant dynasty and a people full of Rationalism; Spain is weak and impotent, and as France is the foremost nation in Freethought in the world, the only motiv that could induce her to move against Italy would be a certain old grudge of commercial rivalry.

Among the archbishops in this country, a third one, Ryan, has now followed the course of Corrigan and Gibbons, and delivered himself of a mixture of abuse of Bruno and exhortation to take up force for the pope. We print his production on another page. We also print, following it, the prayer spoken of to be offered to St. Joseph.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

More.

More reports continually arrive of the Ascension to heaven of murdering rascals and beasts. From San Antonio, Texas, James McCoy has ascended to his heavenly place. He was hanged for the murder of the sheriff of the county, under circumstances of peculiar atrocity that hav awakened against him uncommon detestation.

"In attendance upon the victim Father Maloney has been constant. He received extreme unction at 11 o'clock and expressed himself as thoroughly satisfied. The march to the scaffold was begun a little after."

He expressed himself as "thoroughly satisfied." And so a man can lead a life of brutal debauchery, cruelty, and misdeeds, and at the end be provided with something that will make him thoroughly satisfied. A man can steep himself in crime, wrong his fellows, break tender hearts, defy justice and right, and yet feel at ease about it and confident of obtaining happiness unlimited as soon as he has been thrust out of this world by people when he has got so bad they can no longer endure him in it. What must be the effect of such principles? How little and unworthy of thought must seem the opinions of his fellows to a person satisfied that the infinit creator of all those paltry fellows is at any time whatever glad to receive him in his bosom and giv him everything he wants!

And what a place heaven is getting to be! Continually filling up with the biggest rascals that grow upon and disgrace the earth, and at the same time not getting more than one in fifty of the eminent minds that hav done something to make the earth better, it must now be getting just about the last place to go to that could be named. It has been supposed that Infidels lose something in renouncing an expectation of heaven, and they themselvs hav admitted it, only adding that the loss is more than made up by a consequent increase of facility for bettering life here. But even this must be changed now. We will no more admit that we lose anything at all. We don't believe any Infidels want to go to such a place any more now. The company it affords is simply abominable. To hobnob with the patriarchal babe-slaughterers and maid-ravishers, with the holy Inquisitorial torturers, and with the highly religious Catholics who make rotten the politics and fill the jails of our cities—this is what we know any decent Infidel cannot for a moment wish, but must feel his stomach turn at. No more let us say gravely that of course if we could get proof of a future life in heaven we would be glad of it, though we now deny it for want of evidence. Rather let us say now that we don't want it, won't hav it, and will do anything to keep out of it. Hell and its good company would be a thousand times to be preferred. Or rather giv us unconsciousness. Unconsciousness is not without its merits. It is capable of having a good word said for it. Let us hav one of these two, or anything, just so that we do not get heaven. That we are determined not to hav. From it may the Lord deliver us. As many things in theology are becoming reversed in these days, becoming just the opposit of what they were, so is this matter of hell becoming reversed and just the opposit. Hell is now reduced in heat, and in name, even, softened and reduced to hades. And everyone knows the best and greatest geniuses are there. While as the plain truth as to the character of the Bible men of God who hav gone to heaven is being perceived, and attention is being drawn to the character of our criminal class who announce themselvs the most sure of going there, we believe that even among Christians a feeling is rising of pretty considerable indifference to admission to the place. Hell is becoming not by any means uninviting; while heaven is being seen to be just the place of all places that every decent man will want to stay away from.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

WE are pleased to record that Kristofer Janson, the Norwegian poet and Unitarian divine, has translated Remsburg's "Bible Morals" into the Norwegian language. J. C. Forsberg, a Swedish Freethinker, is translating the same work into the Swedish language. The book is an excellent one, and should be read by all peoples.

A TENNESSEE judge recently instructed his grand jury to "indict all persons who publicly express Infidel sentiments." He would better attend to suppressing some of those endless family wars and race riots that disgrace his highly Christian section of our republic. And the lessons of history show that the best way to do this is to import a little Infidelity.

JUDGE GIBSON, of Oakland, Cal., we learn from Freethought, gave some sage advice the other day to the mother of a girl who showed symptoms of religious dementia. The girl testified that she was never allowed to go anywhere except to church, and the judge admonished the parent to keep her from religious society for a while and let her attend parties and the theater.

IN Scotland the proposal to change the cruel and diabolical old creeds is making great commotion. An address has been issued by a body of ministers and elders of the Scottish Free church, representing its conservativ element, setting forth in strong terms the dangers which threaten the Free church in the line of departure from the ancient dogma as it is contained in the Confession of Faith.

MR. GREEN will make his Magazine for October a literary memorial to Horace Seaver. Colonel Ingersoll's funeral oration will lead, and James Parton, T. B. Wakeman, Parker Pillsbury, Dr. Westbrook, and the Editor of the Children's Corner of THE TRUTH SEEKER will tell us what they think of the work and personal worth of the dead Freethinker. This number of the Magazine will be a good one to preserve. We shall hav it for sale; price, 20 cents.

THE Boston friends of Horace Seaver, led by his lifelong friend Mendum, are arranging for a monument to the dead editor. It ought to be a splendid structure that shall show to coming generations what manner of a man was that Editor who for fifty years battled bravely and in his earlier life almost alone for the right of the people to express their thoughts. Those of his friends who desire to honor themselvs and their champion by helping erect this monument can send their contributions to J. P. Mendum, Investigator office, Boston, Mass.

MR. L. K. WASHBURN, assisted by Ernest Mendum, has taken the editorship of the Boston Investigator. No better man could be found than Mr. Washburn. Able, earnest, and sincere, and not afraid to say what he thinks, Mr. Washburn has been for some years one of the brightest Liberal writers and speakers in New England. Personally, he is a genial, companionable man, a good friend to his friends, and a warm foe to his Christian opponents. Of Mr. Mendum the public knows less, but the son of so able and devoted a champion of Freethought as J. P. Mendum should be a valuable aid to the cause and to the paper. May unbounded success attend our elder contemporary and its new editors.

IT now appears that the Syrians who were supposed to hav worshiped Colonel Ingersoll's picture as that of a god or saint, did not perform their reverences with that design, but with one quite different. The reporters who gave the proceeding that interpretation, and all of us who accepted it, were forgetful of the fact that Mohammedans do not worship before pictures Their religion forbids them to worship pictures, images, or representations of any kind—being in this respect superior to Christianity, which in its Catholic division is idolatry. According to explanations of Superintendent Simpson, the Arabs were not adoring the picture; they were simply showing in their own nativ fashion that they took Colonel Ingersoll's good-natured face for the American type and hoped to propitiate it. Two of the Arabs were women, and as they were led into the hospital building, the report says, they threw back many admiring glances at the colonel's beautiful shiny head.

Letters from Friends.

IONIA, Sept. 10, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed post-office order to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. I cannot do without it. I generally read it instead of going to church, and get vastly more information. I hav been delaying to renew, hoping to get some more subscribers that hav promised, but the truth is that church influence is too strong for them. I wished to secure for J. E. Remsburg the opportunity of giving us some of his superb lectures, and hav tried my best to make arrangements for him, but fear I shall not be able to for want of sufficient interest on the part of Liberals in this church-ridden community. S. M. BAYARD.

BATTLE CREEK, MICH., Sept. 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find $3 to pay a year's subscription for your paper, and I would gladly send new names if I knew where to find them. Not that I obscure what little light there is in me after reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. Since D. M. Bennett sent out the first sheet from the West I hav had every number that has been published, and read them with as much understanding as I had at commencing. And I must be a dull scholar if my neighbors do not know how I think of this subject that they are making such ado about. I am eighty years old, and so do not expect to be in sight much longer. I intend to take THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I may liv to do it. WM. NEWMAN.

NEW YORK, Sept. 3, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Several newspapers of this city, speaking on the London strike, say that from any conceivable point of view the existing methods of settling differences between employers and employed are clumsy, cruel, and unfit for use in our present state of advanced civilization. There is, in my opinion, only one way of ending now and forever all strikes and grievances, which is besides perfectly just, especially to the poorer classes. The method is to giv an interest of so much per cent, besides their weekly salaries, to all those working in any business, enterprise, etc., etc., from the most to the least important, so that there may not be in this advanced state of civilization any more masters and slaves, the relativ positions to-day of employers and employed, thus changing the relation into that more humane, of brothers. This system is employed by several factories in this country and abroad, and it works satisfactorily for all parties concerned. Why not make it general?

A SPIRIT OF JUSTICE.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

STAPLES, MINN., Sept. 8, 1889.

Mr. EDITOR: You will find the necessary lucre herewith inclosed for the continuation of my subscription. You will not hav to drop my name from your list—at least, not yet. When I join the heavenly choir and acquire a harp, then, and only then, you may drop me. I hope by that time there will be some postmaster-general religious enough, and with influence enough, to extend our mail facilities to that Mecca of orthodoxy, so that I may continue to enjoy THE TRUTH SEEKER. I should get awfully lonesome without it. How interesting it would be to hav Heston's pictures to compare with the originals—for of course they are all there. But I presume I must do without the paper when I take up the harp. But I'll tell you what I can do in spite of them—I can "sing the praises" of the paper. I hav seen the picture of Moses so often I shall recognize him on sight. But you can stake the everlasting salvation of your soul on it that when I employ a guide to select my location I will not choose Moses. I should want to get settled down to business, and not be forever wandering in the wilderness. I should, however, ask him to explain to me of what material, and how, they constructed their clothing, so it never wore out and the buttons never came off. Then some medium could materialize me, and I could giv away the secret to some enterprising American. And there is Aaron's receipt for making hair oil, that God so jealously guarded. What a bonanza that would be!

I can't conclude this letter without mentioning "The Lady of the Club." It ought to be read by everyone, old and young. Miss Gardener is undoubtedly "the Ingersoll of her sex."

In conclusion—I am fully satisfied with THE TRUTH SEEKER and wish it unlimited success. D. C. JENKINS.

MAITLAND, Mo., Sept. 12, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Still the good work goes on. Some time ago, perhaps two months, there was held in our little village a meeting called the Ministers' Alliance, the object in the opinion of many being to promote the interest of sky-pilots generally, although it wore the cloak of "doing good." Among other things, it was their duty to keep a watchful eye upon all mischief-workers, and especially to prevent any desecration of the "holy Sabbath." The resident Methodist "pilot," being young in the ministry and not well up to the trick of keeping the tugs stretched without doing much pulling, waded in enthusiastically, and his first opportunity came in the shape of a baseball game to be played at our fair-grounds on a certain Sunday between our village nine and a nine from our neighboring town, Mayville. So promptly our little Methodist Episcopal pilot, his coat-tail flapping in the frightened air, wriggled his way up to the captain of our home nine and informed him that if they played the game as proposed he would hav them all arrested and fined. The boys were indignant, but the statute not being in their favor, they were on the point of desisting, when many of the citizens told them to pay no attention to the little pilot but go ahead. And so they did—had a nice game and a good crowd, and the people enjoyed the fresh, open air in the stead of taking in the musty old stock in the churches held over from the previous Sunday. But the little pilot, not to be outdone, promptly found his way before our district judge, and in the fullness of his heart made bare his little story. The judge heard him through, then asked him if the boys disturbed anyone. The pilot replied that he did not know as they did. He was then asked where they played, and answered, "At the fair-grounds." And also being asked if anyone lived close to there, he said, No. Thereupon the judge (Anthony) told him the best thing he could do would be to go home and attend to his own affairs. And thus the first job of the great "alliance" fell flat and the people were victorious. AN OBSERVER.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

KENT, O., Sept. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: As advertised, the Kent Secular Union concluded a series of mass meetings Sunday evening, September 1st. The grove meetings were pronounced a success by all those who had the good fortune or courage to partake of the mental treat offered by the profound reasoning of J. H. Burnham. The earnest appeal in behalf of our endangered liberties made by that veteran worker in freedom's cause, Hon. A. B. Bradford, who evidenced his devotion to human rights by giving his services, even going so far as to refuse to be reimbursed for his traveling expenses incurred in attending the meetings, elicited the responses from many that these meetings were the best of any held under the auspices of the society. Among those who heard Brother Burnham's Saturday night address, in which man's providence was contrasted with that of the Jew God's, were a few of superstition's devotees. Being so long accustomed to having others do their thinking, they found themselvs unable to follow the speaker in his deep reasoning and flights of logic, hence they ventured not again, concluding that the gifted philosopher was crazy. Nearly two thousand years of teaching to their ancestors soul-dwindling dogmas like "Believe or be damned," "Take no thought for the morrow," etc., as might hav been expected, under the law of necessity, produced such results in the capacity of the devotee. Place the credit to that scheme of salvation in the religion of superstition, which puts humility above dignity and exalts belief above conduc'. Under the call for volunteer speeches that venerable Abolitionist of Warren, O., Thomas Douglass, came forward, roused his hearers to the need of action in defense of liberty, and made many friends who will gladly welcome him at our annual gathering to help the cause by his presence and voice.

Thanks to the generosity of the friends of equal rights and fair play, the executiv committee hav met and paid the heavy expenses of the series of mass meetings, and we hav a surplus with which to upbuild the society's library.

MARIUS HEIGHTON, Secretary.

NORWALK, Sept. 12, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am a delighted and constant reader of your very valuable paper, and receive therefrom a great deal of solid food for thought. The following is the way I think:

"These are the times which try men's souls," is an expression which may be used to-day as when written by our "Author-hero," Thomas Paine. What are we doing in regard to mental liberty? Very little in comparison to what our opponents, the theologians, and their dupes and allies, the Woman's Christian Temperance Uunion, are doing for their cause. There are a quite a number of Freethinkers who, if approached on the subject of religion, will say, "Oh, I hav thought that for a long time, but dare not say anything about it, because I am afraid it will hurt my business," and so they continue on in that way, neither turning to the right nor left to avert the wrongs which are building up like walls about us. A good many of them absolutely refuse by their paltry excuses to read of such literature as might enlighten them. Such papers as THE TRUTH SEEKER, the Boston Investigator, etc., contain nothing of a contaminating nature to a honest, Liberal-minded person of either sex, but rather contain very pleasant, instructiv, and encouraging literature. And what is more gratifying to an honest man or woman than to be enabled to read the productions from the pens of such noble men as Thomas Paine, D. M. Bennett, Horace Seaver, Colonel Ingersoll, and others? Where is there another who could pay such a beautiful tribute to the dead as that which Colonel Ingersoll paid to his, and our, dear friend Horace Seaver? Where? echo answers, Where? Oh, how I wish there were more Ingersolls and more Seavers, and less Dixes, Talmages, and Mike Corrigans; more secular schools, and less churches and parochial schools! According to the New York Sun there are not school-houses enough in New York to accommodate the children who wish to attend, there being quite a number who were unable to gain admission at the beginning of the term. The Sun thinks that we ought to hav more of them, and so do I. Why not tear down, or turn into school-houses, such useless buildings as churches, instead of keeping them locked up for six days a week, and only open three or four hours on the seventh? And why not take the money that it costs to support sky-pilots and pay big pew-rents, and use it to educate the young? Or, if they must hav God-houses with altars and playthings, they should be made to pay taxes for them. But no, rather than giv up their untaxed clubhouses, they would prefer to see the children grow up in ignorance, and then some will wonder why it is that Catholicism has such a strong hold on the country. WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

TECUMSEH, NEB., Sept. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In your issue of August 24th I notice an article from "Polonius," in answer to one from "Saul," concerning the introduction of God into the constitution of North Dakota, and while I realize the ability of the latter to fully answer his critic, I beg permission to offer a word, merely to indicate that here in Nebraska there is another who cannot but provoke a ripple, small though it be, upon the bosom of the orthodox sea of dominancy. "Polonius" begins his effusion with malignant allusions to Messrs. Paine and Ingersoll. Why heap upon two men only so much orthodox venom when such men as Jefferson, Adams, Washington, Franklin, Madison, Hamilton, Jackson, Lincoln, and Grant hav had their names registered nowhere upon the class roll of a Christian church? "How frail the temple of American liberty without these ten [including Paine] great pillars!" It would appear that many orthodox would hav us close our eyes to the pages of history and forget that it was the bigotry of the church that applied the fagot to Bruno and Servetus; that foully murdered that pure, defenseless woman Hypatia in the streets of Alexandria, beating her brains out with the club of St. Peter; that persecuted Copernicus, Galileo, and Kepler, all of whom sought to discover truths accepted by after generations as the greatest intellectual legacies to mankind; that put to death hundreds of thousands in the name of the Christian religion.

To say nothing of the necessarily chaotic character of the Bible and its questionable authenticity, as shown by the orthodox history of its canon, the conduct of its advocates, both past and present, cannot but occasion the strongest feelings of suspicion in those of us not possessed of a super-amount of blind credulity, and hence it is that many feel that a state might judiciously omit the name of God in its constitution, in imitation of that of our nation, whose framers for both goodness and greatness hav received the highest encomiums known to history. Gladstone says our national Constitution is "the most wonderful work ever struck off at a time by the brain and purpose of man, and the most perfect instrument which the art of man has ever devised." Yet it is not good enough for the church of to-day. "Polonius" thinks it shockingly sacrilegious that a Christian God should be mentioned coördinately in connection with the non-Christian or heathen gods. Well, does he not know that just so the "heathen" worshiper regards him and his Christ, the odium having merely a relativ application depending upon who would cast it? He concludes his article by saying, "I hope to see the day when the law will prevent the circulation of the blasphemies of would-be smart men like 'Saul.'"

Alas! for the rarity
Of Christian charity
Under the sun.

But, after all, every human being comes into and goes out of this existence in obedience to an immutable law of nature, and if we are to exist after death, the malevolence of our enemies here on earth can in nowise reverse or change the decrees of fate. C. W. TRIGG.

ORILLIA, ONT., CAN., Sept. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav been for many years a Freethinker, but until lately hav not had the pleasure of coming in contact with your paper THE TRUTH SEEKER, or in fact any other founded on the same principle. I hav received quite a number of copies lately, and must say that I appreciate them very much, especially the illustrations by W. Heston, which I think are as near the proper thing as it is possible to get.

I may be venturing a little too far in asking your consideration of what I am going to subject to your notice. The argument is purely original with me, but may hav been commented upon by somebody more versed and able than I. I refer to the creation of man. Of course the Christian belief is that man was the last article or piece of mechanism turned out of the creator's hands, and that Eve was made out of one of his ribs—I believed it myself once. This is the general belief. Now the first mention of the creation of man is in Gen. i, 27: "So God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." Now, this is sufficient to show that there was no need of any surgical operation being performed on Adam's ribs for the sake of securing him a helpmeet, as he already had one according to Gen. i, 27. What strikes me most is the arrangement of the creation in the second chapter of Genesis, in which man is made about the third or fourth article—before the beasts, at all events—which flatly contradicts the first chapter. What I wish to draw attention more particularly to is Gen. ii, 18–20: "It is not good that man should be alone; I will make him a help meet for him. And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air, and brought them unto Adam, to see what he would call them; and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field; but for Adam there was not found a help meet for him." From this I would infer that God caused Adam to inspect the animals he had created not solely for the purpose of naming them, but to see if he would prefer anyone of them as a helpmeet or companion, else why should he say, "But for Adam there was not found a help meet?" After the inspection he bethought him of the rib, out of which he forms woman. Now, it seems an absurdity to rob poor Adam of a rib to make a woman, when we are told in Gen. i, 27, that "God created man in his own image; in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them." We do not read of two women being in the garden, so if the Christian believer studies these two chapters, he cannot help but be in a quandary as to which is correct. He must, therefore, if he goes according to the dictates of reason, discountenance both. Gen. ii, 20, is somewhat of a substantiation of the Darwin theory, looked at in the proper light, especially if the gorilla or monkey species were amongst the procession on parade for Adam's inspection.

One thing must be said in Adam's favor, that is that he displayed good taste and nicety of judgment in not selecting one of the aforesaid for his helpmeet. But he was not acting in a very grateful manner to his maker, inasmuch as he caused him extra work and labor in forming a woman for him, but it will naturally be supposed that that was no extra trouble to God, as he had no doubt calculated on doing it beforehand. Possibly he only caused the procession of animals, etc., to pass before Adam for a mere matter of form, but it looks rather fishy when he said, "But for Adam there was not a help meet found." He must hav meant found amongst the animals. ED. CLARKE.

PORTSMOUTH, O., Sept. 8, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: To-day at Mead's Grove, a beautiful spot a few miles north of Slocum's station, on the Portsmouth branch of the Cincinnati, Washington & Baltimore railroad, closed a camp-meeting given under the management of Ralph C. Jones, late a major in the Salvation Army. The station above alluded to was named after Sam Slocum, who, I am informed, went crazy on religion. He imagined he was a Joshua, and thought he could stop anything dead still—the sun, the moon, the stars, and all the hosts of heaven. Why, he got so bad that he tried to check earthly things, and finally succeeded in putting a stop to himself by hanging. One day he presented himself before an approaching train and ordered it to stop, which it did, but not because he had so ordered, but to clear the track and save his life. Before he could be displaced, however, from his position, he had to be knocked down. He was shortly afterward lodged in the old jail in this city, which is a few steps from my home. And after singing and praying for a month or so in his demented way, he gave up the ghost by swinging himself off at the end of his bedquilt. In the language of one who reasons for himself, "Giv me death rather than the poisonous dregs of superstition"—that is to say, clasp me in nature's arms in sweet, eternal sleep, rather than make my life a prison-house, so to speak, a den where crawl hideous monsters called Fathers, Sons, and Holy Ghosts, monsters who rob man, woman, and child of that priceless gem, liberty; who make criminal that which is virtuous and true, and reward that which is base and cruel. I may be damned and consigned to endless torture for expressing this truth, but I iv knowing that if I am I will hav plenty of company, and good company at that. I will be among the grandest and the greatest of the world's soldiers and thinkers. The music may all be up at the other place, and if it is I will know that it is stolen property, robbed from the Beethovens and the Wagners who are suffering the torments of the damned.

Returning to the camp-meeting, I will say it accomplished the usual amount of work—more souls made than saved. True, large crowds attended, but the majority went to see the sights. The Portsmouth Solomons were on hand, and no doubt did all in their power to make good the first commandment, "Be fruitful and multiply." Jones, the leader, if reports be true, is a thoroughbred in this direction. He is a good mixer, and they say was forced to resign from the Salvation Army because of ways that are crooked and bad. He is one of seven brothers, all of whom took part in this special meeting. As the saying goes, "The Joneses are hell."

This is a city from which the rich man's son, for theft, is sent to the asylum, and the poor man's to the penitentiary.

'Tis strange but nevertheless true,
That there, rich fathers are churchmen, too.

I suppose the juggling of the law, which makes a forehead echo if you touch it, is brought about and accounted for by the passage which reads:

God moves in a mysterious way
His wonders to perform.

My little baby, six months old, is just recovering from a terrible case of typhoid fever. His getting well is a puzzler to the doctors, and those who insisted that prayer was stronger than medicin are flitting about saying: "All for the best," "God is good," etc. When the little fellow was at his worst a certain individual, who wears his knees out praying, remarked to a friend of mine: "Andres is getting repaid for the way he has talked regarding his God and the Bible." And by the way, he who made this remark is a rascal and a thief. Such as he picture Jehovah as a punisher of the innocent for the crimes (if such is unbelief) of another, and just such form the loudest ranters. They are the clergy's main mouthpieces. They are the worst kind of hypocrits, and running at large as they do, are dangerous to the really good and honest men and women. WILL S. ANDRES.

DES MOINES, IA., Sept. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: The Secular Union organized in this city last March is now in a healthy and flourishing condition, and with high hopes for the future. The growth of such an organization must necessarily be slow, as it appeals, not to the emotional and superstitious part of man's nature, but to his reason and common sense, which Christianity came near extinguishing until science and Rationalism came to the rescue.

The clergy, thus far, hav deemed it prudent on their part to ignore us. They ignore us upon the same principle that a pickpocket ignores the policeman. But the time is coming when such tactics will not pay, and they will soon find this out.

Some months ago we undertook to work up a debate between some minister of this city and that eloquent champion of Freethought, Charles Watts. A challenge was sent to Prof. D. R. Dungan, professor of the Bible department of Drake University. After evading the main issue of the challenge as long as he was able, the professor said that he would require $500 for defending the cause of Christ for six nights! He added that the ministers of the city were opposed to debating, and consequently would take no interest in such a discussion. Mr. Dungan knew that it was impossible for him to be paid $500, and his demand was but another mode of hoisting the white flag. If anything shows the American clergy to be a consummate set of moral cowards, it is their unwillingness to defend upon the platform what they preach from the pulpit.

Speaking of ignoring, the preachers ought to know how to ignore people. They had enough experience last spring, when they undertook to hav Prof. R. Ellsworth Call removed from the chair of science in the Des Moines high school, on account of his pronounced Freethought principles. They were so ignored that their railing and secret plotting were held in contempt by the directors, who reinstated Mr. Call for another year.

About two weeks ago a young man named Philemon Gobiet, employed in Harlan's drug store, came from the Presbyterian church on Sunday evening, where he had been leading the young people's meeting, and went to bed, leaving an open Bible by his bedside. In a few hours something in the room caught fire, and before the unfortunate man could be rescued he was suffocated by the smoke and flames. Let us imagin for a moment that this young man was an Infidel, and came from the meeting of the Secular Union. Suppose that instead of the Bible he had a volume of Paine or Ingersoll by his bedside! How unfortunate the preachers are that such was not the case! It would hav been equal to $10,000 capital in their pockets. We would never hear the last of "the avenging hand of the Lord" upon his enemies. Instead of this, we hear, "The Lord gave, the Lord taketh away: blessed be the name of the Lord."

Two new churches are being erected in Des Moines this year—the Lutheran and the Campbellite. The Young Men's Christian Association is also erecting a $50,000 edifice. The money for the latter was filched from the pockets of the citizens by a systematic scheme of begging. The taxes on it, however, will be stolen from the taxpayers as long as they will let the church hold out one hand to beg, while they steal with the other. Are not the churches, just as the grand antislavery agitator, William Lloyd Garrison, called them, "a brotherhood of thieves?"

The erection of the Bruno monument in Rome was a grand triumph for Freethought in the Old World. Why should it not be equally triumphant in the New? How could it be done but by erecting a statue of Thomas Paine in Philadelphia, on the spot where he toiled and labored for the independence of America? This should be done within the next ten years, and I hope the Freethinkers of America and all who appreciate Paine's services to this country will take the matter into serious consideration. Would it not be grand if Colonel Ingersoll could deliver the oration at the unveiling of the monument? Yours for Universal Mental Liberty,

FRANKLIN STEINER.

HIGHLANDS, N. J., Sept. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of August 24th I read with much interest the letter and Standard clipping from Dr. C. E. Boynton, of Onondaga Hill, N. Y. I admire the frank and outspoken manner with which he gave the facts he knew to us readers, to the extent that I was about to write a letter of commendation to him, and to urge our other Freethinkers to write more of their personal observations in a like manner, when to my surprise I behold a letter in this week's issue, September 14th, from A. Allen Noe, of Wheeling, W. Va., who seems to be as much hurt by the same letter as I was pleased. However, I love the truth, and hav several good reasons to believe that the doctor told the truth, too. Of course Mr. Noe does not think so, but he certainly has failed in his attempt to prove anything different. So I for one most reluctantly giv the doctor the benefit of my honest commendation, as I first intended, and hope to hear more from his pen, especially in regard to his experience at the Spiritualist camps—as I infer from the letter named he will not hesitate to giv us the benefit of his experience if any good can possibly come of it.

Mr. Noe seems to think it a difficult task to name any full-fledged Spiritualist who ever got in an asylum on account of his Spiritualism. Now, Mr. Noe, I do not know what you mean by full-fledged, but I can assure you, and with reliable statistics, too, that no small per cent of the believers or followers contribute to the grand total of lunatics in our asylums at the present day.

Mr. Noe very emphatically asserts that Spiritualism is not a belief, but a knowledge, and also asserts in the same emphatic terms that if you know a thing you can certainly tell how you know it. Yet I fail to learn anything from Mr. Noe's letter verifying the fact that he knows any more than the ordinary Spiritualist, and to judge from the last sentences of his letter many people of less intelligence than the doctor he refers to would certainly feel assured that Mr. Noe himself was on the very precipice of lunacy.

I hope Mr. Noe will pardon any intrusion I made by speaking in behalf of the doctor, and I will conclude by a few remarks for myself. Now, Mr. Noe, I see you are an adept at asking questions. Please show your smartness in answering one or two. You say science is demonstrated facts, also that Spiritualism is science, and is capable of demonstrating itself. Why, then, are Spiritualists unable to giv this one demonstration and prove the fact that the grave does not end all? You admit yourself that no one ever came back from the grave. How then do you know better than others of any future life? Come now, no "Pretty Polly" biz. Giv the readers a good square answer. The simple assertion of your saying, We know our friends liv in a spirit world, does not suffice. You demand demonstration from the doctor why he does not know. I demand the same of you. Now, since you were so liberal in offering the doctor $2 to $1, I will deposit $500, to be forfeited for the benefit of the American Secular Union, to carry out the purpose of the Nine Demands, in case you can produce to THE TRUTH SEEKER office a sealed or even open letter from the dead, as you describe in your letter. I will also giv you $100 additional for expenses. Come, now, if you are not a crank, do something for yourself and to help the cause of liberty with $500. I hav attended Spiritualist meetings, and know just a little about what I am saying. Come now, no "Pretty Polly" biz, I say. Just strike again. No bones will be broken. WM. JOHNSON.

ONONDAGA HILL, N. Y., Sept. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: In reply to Mr. A. Allen Noe in remarks pertaining to Spiritualism that appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 14, 1889, I would say to his following questions:

1. He asks if there are at present any full-fledged, intelligent Spiritualists in asylums.

Answer: Not to my knowledge. Asylums are not supposed to confine intelligent people, be they Spiritualists or not.

2. Are any Spiritualists in asylums (presumably insane) on account of Spiritualism?

Answer: In my judgment, more than fifty per cent of the insane hear and see things subjectivly while awake. The cause of subjectiv sensations is well known to exist in the tissues, of which the excited nerve is a part. If these causes are sufficient to render the patient dangerous or unable to take care of himself he is taken to an asylum. People who can support themselvs and are not dangerous, yet are subject to exaggerated forms of subjectiv sensation, can with safety pose as the Jew, Christian, Mohammedan, Hindoo, Buddhist, fetich man, or Spiritualist of any order.

It has been one of the prime functions of religions to excite the subjectiv in man. Every subjectiv sensation is a lie and in a measure acts destructivly. There is objectiv work enough for every nerve fiber and cell. Every subjectiv process is pathological and therefore a waste to the organism.

A dose of alcohol, morphia, nicotine, belladonna, or hasheesh may induce the subjectiv action of nerve tissue. No one denies that the organism suffers in consequence.

The victim of narcotization believes his sensations real. It is useless to argue with him. He will see a mockery in your words. He sees, he feels, that of which he speaks. He points his finger. There is his proof. He says, If your science claims that these things are not real I hav the living proof before my eyes that cancels all your science. Yet he perchance may be profound in many paths of learning. If he is, does alcohol or hasheesh fail in its effect upon cerebral cells? No. For when his great brain is narcotized there is a deeper pathos in his words, his visions of the unreal are more clear, he mounts in eloquence to the sublime—perhaps, like Bulwer, pictures a "Linone" or convinces a Zoellner who could trace the cyclones of the sun that Newton's laws of force and motion might be set aside.

3. Why is Spiritualism a fallacy?

Answer: Please refer to any modern work on analytical mechanics. Observe the equation that expresses in mathematical language the law that the potential energy expended is equal to the kinetic energy developed, and remember that any discussion of the action of force upon matter must be founded on this equation. By measurements show if you can that the "forces" to which the Spiritualist refers conform to this formula. Until you or some one else do this "spirit force" must stand as a fallacy in the light of mathematical physics.

4. Why does death end individual existence?

Because the potential energy of the organism reaches an equipotential with inanimate matter when death occurs. Nutrition failing from some impediment to reach centers whose high potential is essential to life, stops the vital movement of that complicated machine known as man. The gas flame that I this night turn down could with as much logic claim to hav an individual hereafter as man.

Nature doesn't "pickle" old worn-out men or burnt-out flames of gas. Their types may appear on this or any other world again, for, irrespectiv of time or place, events will depend upon the nature, configuration, and motion of the bodies concerned.

The argument of Spiritualism is a web of sentiment from first to last, and certain phenomena of induced somnambulism (mesmerism), ecstasy, and subjectiv sensation present it as a beautiful mirage to the human imagination.

If I had seen all that any Spiritualist that I hav ever met has claimed to hav seen, I should, if I retained the little sanity I now possess, retain essentially the same position that I hav taken. For it were more logical to explain such seeming phenomena by the theory that special senses had been made to operate subjectivly for a time than to believe that the mathematical harmonies of force and motion, the theorems of kinematics themselvs, were swept in chaos.

I hav many friends who are Spiritualists. For years a respected medium was almost my only confidant.

I hope that the paths of Liberalism will be wide enough, so that none who wage war against despotic creed shall be crowded out.

Such language as I used in the article to which Mr. Noe refers I hav often used in arguments with Spiritualists who are some of my nearest friends. The good-natured way in which they usually answered me was not exactly in the tone of one co-Liberal's letter, who, I am sorry to say, was a little more personal than our differences of opinion demand.

Grant at Vicksburg.

At the capture of old Vicksburg, 'mid storms of shot and shell,
Grant led the Union army up, though many comrades fell;
They reached the broken ramparts of that once strong rebel stand,
And there beneath the stars and stripes, with saber in his hand,
Stood General Grant, the hero, magnanimous and brave;
And, oh, what inspiration his commanding presence gave!
The soldiers fought like tigers; they bravely faced the foe,
And Johnstone and Pemberton began to see their woe.
From out the din of battle brave General Grant appears,
And with determined onset he said, with hopeful cheers:
"I mean to capture Vicksburg if it takes me thirty years!"
The rebel armies faltered; their hearts were going down.
They knew they could not conquer Grant; they could not save the town.
They saw he was determined; they knew their hopes were few,
While slowly but surely Grant led his army through,
Till Pemberton surrendered and all his armies, too.
Grant's soldiers gathered 'round him; they grasped the rugged hand
That helped unfurl the stars and stripes so proudly o'er the land.
Around old Vicksburg cluster yet the memories of that day,
When General Grant marched proudly up in panoplied array,
And then marched proudly back again the victor of the fray.
The name of Grant was heralded like lightning o'er the land,
And now upon the scroll of fame it rests sublimely grand,
And there, engrayed in letters bright, it will forever stand.

When the Chickens Come Home.

You may take the world as it comes and goes,
And you will be sure to find
That fate will square the account she owes,
Whoever comes out behind.
And all things bad that a man has done,
By whatsoever induced,
Return at last to him, one by one,
As the chickens come home to roost.

You may scrape and toil and pinch and save,
While your hoarded wealth expands,
Till the cold, dark shadow of the grave
Is nearing your life's last sands;
You will hav your balance struck some night,
And you'll find your hoard reduced.
You'll view your life in another light,
When the chickens come home to roost.

You can stint your soul and starve your heart,
With the husks of a barren creed,
But you will know if you play a part,
Will know in your hour of need;
And then as you wait for death to come,
What hope can there be deduced
From a creed alone? you will lie there dumb
While your chickens come home to roost.

Sow as you will, there's time to reap,
For good and bad as well,
And conscience, whether we wake or sleep,
Is either a heaven or hell.
And every wrong will find its place,
And every passion loosed
Drifts back and meets you face to face,
When the chickens come home to roost.

Boys and Girls.

HOW THEY SHOULD BE TREATED.

No boy or girl likes to be treated as an inferior or an underling. "Do not ask so many questions." "Children should be seen and not heard." The effect of these two sentences has repressed some of the brightest intellects in childhood. Boys and girls find themselvs in a, to them, new world. They must inquire in order to become acquainted with the world they liv in. If a grown person asks a question in regard to any subject he is treated with proper respect and his inquiries answered, but a child is often turned away, his questions ignored, and sometimes treated with contempt or ridicule. This is not right. Boys and girls should be treated as equals seeking knowledge. They should be advised, encouraged, helped. If their questions are not properly answered they will try and find out for themselvs. This is perplexing, uphill, and frequently dangerous work. If older persons do not know how to answer questions properly, they should frankly say so, and then proceed with the children to find the solution to all the problems that arise. Children should never be told that they don't know anything—that they are dunces. This reflects upon their parents. Confidence should be placed in children. To rely upon them teaches self-reliance. Let them try experiments and thus develop mechanical talents. Walk with the children—talk with them, make friends of them, win their confidence and giv them yours, teach them and talk to them, if you would hav good children and well informed.

We should always strive to do our best in any undertaking, no matter whether it be great or small. "Push and energy open the way to success."

We should hav a definit purpose in life—an end in view which, when attained, will make us happy. And we should always keep to this end, and not allow the love of pleasure, ease, and show to divert us. It is this, self-indulgence, that is our greatest enemy. It hinders the poor boy and girl, as well as the more favored ones, from developing and using the opportunities at their command.

We should choose in life that work which seems best suited to our taste and talents.

And we should acquire knowledge—knowledge that will be useful and necessary in our work. We should read, and read that which is for our most immediate benefit. Aristippus, one of the ancient philosophers, rightly said: "The truly learned are not those that read much, but those who read what is useful."

It has been said, and truly, "The noblest lives are those which aim not at great things, but strive to be useful in every possible way." No useful calling is low; but the higher the calling, the lower it is to be negligent in it.

We should strive to set a good example to our juniors. Children learn morals by example. They learn nearly everything by example. They try to do what they see done by others. If we all do right ourselvs, our younger brothers and sisters will try to do the same. The poet truly says:

The boy who always means to do
The very best he can;
Who always keeps the right in view,
And aims to be a man—

Such boys as these will grow to be
The men whose hands will guide
The future of our land, and we Shall speak their names with pride.

All honor to the boy who is
A man at heart, I say;
Whose legend on his shield is this,
"Right always wins the day."

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

Origin of Arithmetical Signs.

The sign of addition is derived from the initial letter of the word plus. In making the capital letter it was made more and more carelessly, until the top part of the p was placed near the center, and hence the plus sign was finally reached.

The sign of subtraction was derived from the word minus. The word was first contracted into m n s, with a horizontal line above to indicate the contraction, then the letters were omitted, which left the short line, —.

The multiplication sign was obtained by changing the plus sign into the letter X. This was done because multiplication is a short method of addition.

Division was formerly indicated by placing the dividend above a horizontal line and the divisor below.

In order to save space in printing the dividend was placed to the left and the divisor to the right, and a dot was written in the place of each.

The radical sign was derived from the initial letter of the word radix.

The sign of equality was first used in 1557. It was used to avoid repeating the words "equal to."

Well Informed.

Simplicity of language is good, no matter to whom one is speaking, but it is best to avoid "talking down," even to young children. Every teacher finds, sooner or later, that children are often better informed than they are supposed to be.

The San Francisco Chronicle reports a dialog overheard in a kindergarten. The teacher was giving an elementary object lesson.

"What is this?" she asked, as she touched the table.

"Wood."

"And what is this?" she added, touching the fender.

"Iron."

"Very good! And what is this?" taking up a bottle.

"Glass."

"Excellent! Now what is this?" fumbling her watch chain.

"Brass," answered one of the small boys, and with that the lesson ended.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

What the Little Ones Are Saying.

First little boy: "Is your father fond of fish?" Second little boy: "Yes, very; he has C. O. D. printed on his business cards."

Mother (severely): "Robert, you did very wrong to do what I told you not to do. As a punishment for your disobedience I forbid you to play with Willie again this afternoon." Bobby and Willie twist nervously in their chairs for half an hour, when Willie observes: "Ma, do you think it's fair to punish both of us for what Bobby done?"

Correspondence.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Sept. 6, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: In the Corner of August 17th appeared a poem on "Sergeant Jasper at Fort Moultrie." I read it with much interest, and I hav always regarded Sergeant Jasper as one of the bravest and noblest heroes of the American Revolution. But the soldier that I honor above all other American soldiers is General Ulysses S. Grant, so I send the inclosed poem on "Grant at Vicksburg," and hope you can find a place for it in the Corner. I regard Grant's Vicksburg campaign as one of the greatest feats of the late war. Admiral Porter says: "If General Grant had never performed any other military act during the war, the capture of Vicksburg alone, with all the circumstances attending the siege, would hav entitled him to the highest renown."

Vicksburg surrendered on the 4th of July, and in an eloquent and touching speech General McPherson said: "The achievements of this hour will giv a new meaning to this memorable day, and Vicksburg will highten the glow in the patriot's heart that kindles at the mention of Bunker Hill or Yorktown. The dawn of a conquered peace is breaking before you. The plaudits of an admiring world will hail you wherever you go."

Hoping you will accept my contribution, and that it will interest some one, I remain as ever, Your true friend,

GEO. J. REMSBURG.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. Poetry.

When You're in Rome.

If you're weak and vacillating, hav no will to call your own;
If you're lacking in ambition, and deficient in "backbone;"
If you'd rather take things easy (make of life a pleasure trip),
And don't care to mount the ladder, all the other proverbs skip,
Stick to this one, gentle reader, 'tis a maxim made for you:
"When you are among the Romans, do just as the Romans do."

To be odd and independent doth require courage great;
To defend the right will often call forth bitterness and hate.
Sneers and jeers await the hero who doth dare his voice to raise
'Gainst the easy-going Romans and their cheerful, Roman ways.
Lest you'd hav unpleasant language spitefully addressed to you,
"When you are among the Romans, do just as the Romans do."

When you've grown somewhat accustomed to the Roman's easy life,
You will scarcely care to figure as a hero in the strife;
You will fold your hands and murmur, with a smile upon your lip,
"I should like to be a hero, but I guess I won't this trip."
You will chloroform your conscience with a soothing word or two:
"When you are among the Romans, do just as the Romans do."

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

A Patron Saint.

Many kindly saints there are
Mentioned in the calendar;
Saints to pray to, saints to bow to—
Be as good as you know how to!
Some, to make the spirit easy,
Pray to Francis of Assisi;
Others deem it safer, meeter,
To address the good Saint Peter.
Plenty in a direful "stew"
Turn to Saint Bartholomew,
To beseech the "fair persuasion"—
Kneeling, as their wishes vary,
Now to Martha, now to Mary.

If I only knew the way to Find the proper saint to pray to,
I would lift a supplication
Worthy of your emulation.
For I soon shall cross the ocean
(That abode of wild commotion),
And my state when I'm a-sailing
Is a subject of bewailing.
I hav tested each invention
Every loving friend could mention;
Naught avails against the frantic
Pitching of the mad Atlantic.
Over what results I'm certain
It is wise to draw the curtain!

Tell me in my tribulation
Unto whom to "pour libation!"
I would pray to all the sainted
Raphael and Titian painted
(Though the many names affright one),
If I thought I'd hit the right one!
Saint Champagne did some one mention
Being worthy my attention?
Hail, then, though thy titles vary.
Louis Roederer and Pommery,
Moet-Chandon, Grand Vin Sec,
Perrier Jouet—well, et seq.
Prithee send—my prayer is fervent—
Comfort to your humblest servant!

—Munsey's Weekly.

WAS ABRAHAM LINCOLN A CHRISTIAN?

What Is Being Said.

NOT YOUR GRANDMOTHER.

[From the London Commonweal.]

Liv your own life in your own day. You are not your grandmother.

HOLY SMOKE.

[From the New York Herald.]

A valuable church property was entirely destroyed by fire the other day.

Holy smoke!

WHAT!!

[From the Troy Press.]

"Gravitation is God." This is the latest definition of deity, and by no less eminent authority than Bishop John P. Newman.

THE HEATHEN AND THE MINERS.

[From the Boston Globe.]

Would it be a bad idea to contribute a little less money to the foreign missions just now and devote a few thousands to relieving the starvation of the miners' families in Spring Valley?

MONKS AND MONKEYS.

[From the Jewish Times and Observer.]

The Church of England proposes to establish an order of monks. What is now wanted to make the world happy is a church that will establish an order of monkeys. Probably the Agnostics will giv us this.

WON'T TAKE DOWN ITS CREED.

[From the Observer (Presbyterian).]

A pirate's flag was nailed to the almost inaccessible steeple of a church on Long island, and the Christian Register intimates that, though it may be difficult to remove this flag, yet it fears "it will occasion more trouble to the Presbyterian church to haul down its objectionable standards than to remove the malicious symbol from this church steeple." We can assure our contemporary that it will be some years before any "objectionable standards" of the Presbyterian church are hauled down. It will keep the old colors hoisted for some while to come.

RELIGION IN CITIES.

[From the New York World.]

The city pastors who resumed their work yesterday preached to strangers and, to a large extent, to empty pews. The length of the summer vacation in fashionable church circles appears to be increasing. In this rapid age people seem disposed to try to get within a few months annually enough religion to last for the whole year.

THE BABY.

[From the New York Ledger.]

A baby is a specimen of human nature uncontroled by principle. It is a being of fierce instincts with no morals. It is the opinion of observant persons who hav studied babies from a philosophical standpoint that if their capacity for mischief were equal to their ferocity, they would soon exterminate the adults of the human family.

CHICAGO CATHOLICS.

[From the Western American, Chicago, Ill.]

An Irish Romanist employed in the city hall said to another employee, recently: "See that north of Ireland Protestant; he got his walking papers this mornin' and they will all get 'em soon." This is evidence that the joint conspirators hav the appointing power by the throat, and no city money is to be paid anyone who will not be blackmailed by uniformed women beggars sent out by the Romish corporation.

A CHANGE.

At the late anniversary celebration of the landing of the Pilgrim fathers, the Irish Catholics who hav filled up Massachusetts introduced some of their ceremonies and sentiments, upon which Puck sings:

The harp that once through Tara's halls
The soul of music shed,
No longer hangs on Tara's walls
As if that soul had fled;
It wakes, at Plymouth Rock to twist
The British lion's tail,
And scare the haughty Briton with
The Irish Clan-na-Gael.

SABBATH MAILS.

[From the Christian Statesman.]

We hav no doubt that the action of Postmaster-General Wanamaker meets the cordial approbation of the president and the members of his cabinet. Is it not the duty of all good citizens to encourage them in their commendable reformation of the mail department? We suggest that the most appropriate way of doing this would be to require that our own post-offices be closed on the Sabbath. As there is a movement being made to secure this result, we hope that all will giv it their cordial and hearty support.

MORE CHRISTS.

[From Freethought.]

Still another "Christ!" Among the passengers of the Zealandia, which arrived from Australia the other day, was an Englishman who had excited the attention of the passengers by his queer conduct. When the vessel docked he went ashore, leaving his baggage to take care of itself, and wandered along the wharves softly humming and whistling religious tunes. A poilce officer found him at this occupation and took him in charge. At the city prison he kept his soft melodies going and refused to talk, except to say that he came from Sidney and that he was Jesus Christ. He was booked as insane and sent to the Home for Inebriates.

THE "CHRISTIAN HOME."

[From the Melbourne, Aus., Liberator.]

It is a funny thing that the last word upon marriage, for Christian nations, should be spoken by bachelors! Jesus and Paul were a couple of narrow-minded bachelors; and the former declared it to be adultery to desire to marry, or what comes to the same thing, to desire a woman. He also bade those who could to mutilate or emasculate themselvs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. And there are still plenty of married people who pay some deference to the teachings of this most fanatical, unsocial, ascetic, woman-hating bachelor. Paul was little better. And the bachelor Catholic priests were the very last persons that seriously altered or interfered with our marriage laws. It is strange the absurdity does not strike people.

MIRACLES.

[From the London Freethinker.]

As we write, we read in the same Northern Daily Telegraph, "Alleged Miraculous Cures at Lourdes," reporting from the Catholic Universe, that "A young girl from Alencon, who had been blind for two years, recovered her sight when she was taken into the grotto. A navvy from Chartres received a hurt which paralyzed him and made him a cripple for years. He instantly recovered the use of his limbs." Do Protestants believe these wonders? No, they know they only occur among an excited and fanatical crowd already disposed to believe in them. Yet they deem it absolutely wicked to question miracles said to hav occurred a good way off, and a long while ago, for which not a tithe of the evidence can be produced which is forthcoming for the miracles at Lourdes in our own day.

THAT DEBATE.

[From the New York Tribune.]

The Rev. Dr. Wace and Professor Huxley hav been engaging in a religious controversy in which they hav shown great skill in avoiding each other's blows. As thus, for instance:

Huxley: Pretty bad business about those Gadarene pigs, eh, doctor?

Wace: Never mind those pigs, professor. Just look at the Sermon on the Mount.

Huxley: Humph! I can prove that it was the sermon on the plain; but, come now, just see what science has done.

Wace: Oh, well, you are only an Infidel and you know it, so what's the use of talking about it?

Huxley: I don't care if I am; so there.

Then somebody takes the whole thing to a printer, so that we can all witness the fight. And the Christians shout, "Hooray for Wace!" and the Infidels exclaim, "Bully for Huxley!"

UNCLE SAM A PATRON SAINT.

A Minneapolis lady who was for a few days with the West-De Laittre party on the continent tells an amusing story of her visit to Munich. She says:

"I, like other tourists, was notified to appear before the officials to state my business in the city, how long I intended to remain, and many other, as I thought, impertinent questions. When I told them that my given name was Donizetti they stormed and took on dreadfully. They would not believe that my father had named his daughter after the celebrated Italian musician.

"The next question which astonished me was, 'Who is your patron saint?'

"'We are not accustomed to having patron saints in America,' said I, which statement I could not persuade them to believe. Their persistency was so annoying that I concluded to hav a patron saint for the occasion, so I finally said:

"'My patron saint is Uncle Sam.'

"This was quite satisfactory, and it was solemnly recorded opposit my name."

JAPANESE CIVILIZATION.

[From the Boston Transcript.]

As illustrating his claim that the Japanese are a more civilized people than the Americans, a gentleman at a recent Boston dinner table cited Professor Morse's statement that if, in a Japanese city, one picks up a stone to throw at a dog the dog does not run, because he has never had a stone thrown at him, and does not know what the action means. Manifestly, if such a state of universal gentleness and kindness prevails in Japan that not even a stone is thrown at a dog by a boy, there must be a very high and thorough civilization permeating all classes of the population. This argument may not be accepted as complete by the sociologists, who would doubtless maintain that it requires something else than gentleness and humanity to make civilization. But certainly the fact is to be taken as an excellent item of evidence in making out a case of high civilization for the Japanese. And it is a significant fact that it was reserved for our own European-American civilization to introduce the completest refinement of cruelty to animals.

SOME OF CONNECTICUT'S BLUE LAWS.

[From the New York Sun.]

STRATFORD, CONN., Sept. 4th.—The celebration to-morrow of the 250th anniversary of the Congregational church here calls to mind some of the old Connecticut Blue laws, which were in force when our forefathers sat and shivered in the old church. Here are samples of them:

No man shall be a freeman or giv a vote unless he be converted and a member in full communion of one of the churches allowed in this dominion.

No one shall run on the Sabbath day, or walk in his garden, or elsewhere, except reverently to and from meeting.

No one shall travel, cook victuals, make beds, sweep house, cut hair, or shave on the Sabbath day.

No woman shall kiss her child on the Sabbath or fasting day.

No one shall read Common Prayer books, keep Christmas or set days, make minced pies, dance, play cards, or play on any instrument of music except the drum, trumpet, or jewsharp.

No food or lodging shall be offered to a Quaker, Adamite, or other heretic.

If any person turns Quaker he shall be banished and not suffered to return but on pain of death.

No Roman Catholic priest shall abide in the dominion; he shall be banished and suffer death on his return.

ANTIQUITY SYNONYMOUS WITH INFALLIBILITY.

[Felix L. Oswald, M.D., in the Open Court.]

There is a story of an English lackey who accompanied his master to Paris and was greatly scandalized at the unmilitary appearance of the French army. "Them is no soldiers, whatever they call 'em," was his comment; "blue uniforms is perfectly absurd for regular troops, except for the light artillery." That anecdote well characterizes the very prevalent disposition to mistake the results of arbitrary arrangement for facts founded on the "eternal fitness of things." If such arrangements hav the sanction of a time-honored institution, the proof of their fitness is supposed to be complete. "Time is the test of truth," argued the defender of the Holy Inquisition, "and the experience of many successiv generations has proved that witchcraft laws are as necessary as laws against murder, and that leniency to sorcerers is treason to heaven. If witchcraft were a chimera, the defendants would somehow and somewhere hav succeeded in establishing that fact; but it is well known that their trials hav invariably resulted in conviction and cremation. Whatever is, is right."

SUPPORT PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS.

[From the American Catholic News.]

Throguhout the land our two thousand eight hundred parochial schools are opening their doors once more.

There are schools in the land to tempt and allure you with their show and their promises; but you cannot safely send your children there. Your forefathers were tempted in the same way, and you hav the faith because they resisted the temptation. The men who uphold the public schools, and hav perverted them to what they are, snares and pitfalls for Catholic children, are the very men who are constantly denouncing your religion, your pious practices, your church, and your clergy. They care nothing for your real good; they are impelled by an undying hatred of the Catholic church.

Cling to the parochial schools. They are the work of your own sacrifices and self-denial. They hav God's blessing on them. There your children are safe. The parochial school system is extending and improving. Its effects excite alarm among the enemies of the faith, and their very hatred is a proof to you of their excellence. Sustain the parochial school.

WE ARE CIVILIZING THEM.

[From Secular Thought.]

Almost every day some prominent newspaper reports its appreciation that a great change has taken place in religious belief both in England and on this continent, not to speak of France, Germany, and Italy. The New York Times is the latest journal to call attention to the remarkable fact. Take, for instance, it says, the doctrin of eternal punishment. It is no longer preached from Protestant pulpits as it was taught fifty years ago, even twenty years; and yet every orthodox communion retains the doctrin in its formal creed. The change which has come over the Protestant world within a very short time with respect to hell has been radical. The word itself has been omitted almost wholly from the Protestant vocabulary. It terrifies no longer the children in the Sunday-schools and startles no longer the sinners in the churches. Practically they hav lost their fear of the lake of fire and of the torments to which the old preachers consigned the damned. Formerly every sermon dwelt upon the anger, the vengeance, the severity of God, but now the prevailing theme is his mercy and loving kindness.

RATIONALIST PROFESSORS.

[From the Methodist Review.]

Yale College is the headquarters of American Rationalism. It produces more Rationalistic literature than any other institution in the land and thus determins the issue. It is not a question of the number of Rationalists in the faculty, though in this case it is large, but a question of literature. If one professor in Yale should issue more Rationalistic literature than a score of Rationalists in another institution, the former would be the center of the great Infidelity. As the Mississippi river has its source in Minnesota and not in several lakes, but in one, so Rationalism has its source in Yale, and, if not in several, then in a few professors, whose work is fatal to the faith of orthodoxy. Kant gave character to philosophy, Bolingbroke to English Deism, Voltaire to French Infidelity, and Semler to German Rationalism. So one professor may giv character to an institution, and one Rationalist in the faculty may do more harm than may be counteracted by the Christian teaching of all his associates. Unfortunately Yale is positiv in its destructiv work, and must account for it to the Christian sentiment of the land. "It must needs be that offenses will come, but woe to him by whom the offense cometh."

ISRAEL THE MODEL REPUBLIC.

[Secretary Foster of the National Reform Association.]

The nation of Israel was constituted at Mt. Sinai as "the custodians of the law, liberty, and religion of mankind." A republican form of government was given them. The three departments of government—the legislativ, judicial, and executiv—were substantially represented in it. Moses, the judge or president, was the chief executiv officer. The seventy elders formed the congress or general government. The court of the gate, or civil sanhedrim, was the arbiter of justice. The heads of the tribes and the officers thereof constituted the tribal or state government. It was a representativ government—the people elected their rulers. It was a constitutional government—the law came from Jehovah. It was a theocracy, as every nation should be. The angel of the covenant, by whom the law was delivered and whom they were warned against provoking, was the Lord Jesus Christ. He proposed the law to the people for their acceptance, as the constitution of the nation. They received and adopted it. "All that the Lord hath said will we do and be obedient." It was a Christocracy, just as every nation will one day be. This is the model after which all the nations will be fashioned when the proclamation is made, "The kingdoms of the world hav become the kingdoms of our Lord and of his Christ."

PAINE THE INVENTOR.

[From the Worthington, Minn., Advance.]

Thomas Jefferson while on one of his morning walks, noticed the construction of a spider's web, and observing that in its radiating lines from a common center it was possible for its owner to go to any point on the circumference with the least possible expenditure of force, drew from it a plan for a city, which was carried out to a limited extent in the plan of the city of Washington, the main avenues of which run outward from the capitol like the spokes of a wagon wheel. In that, and indeed all other respects, a spider's web is constructed according to the strictest principles of geometry. About the same period of our history, Thomas Paine, while taking a morning walk along the bank of the Schuylkill river, near Philadelphia, noticed a spider's web, and it suggested to his ingenious mind the idea of an iron suspension bridge, and thus hav come about as a gradual outgrowth of that idea our modern colossal structures for crossing deep and rapid rivers. It so happened that, at that time, there was no machinery in America equal to the work of constructing such an edifice, and so it happened that Paine went to France and bore the part he did in the French Revolution.

CHURCH AND STATE.

[Bertrand, Neb., Herald.]

The National Reform movement for Sunday laws and an amendment to the Constitution providing that religion be taught in the public schools is clearly wrong and wicked. It is a dangerous menace to the liberties of the people and detrimental to the best interests of intelligent civilization. It is born of the same narrow, bigoted, intolerant spirit which attended a union of church and state in the days of papal supremacy; and which later drove Roger Williams into the wilderness of Rhode Island, banished the Quakers from Massachusetts, and burnt women at the stake for supposed witchcraft. Christ said: "My kingdom is not of this world." Yet the National Reformers by their efforts to secure religious laws clearly design to make it such. Religion is something which the conscience alone should decide, and wherein civil laws should not be allowed to dictate. "Not by might, nor by power, but by spirit, saith the Lord." And yet the National Reformers are working vigorously to secure the might and power of the state for the enforcement of the principles of the Christian religion. The movement is wrong. It is against the true teachings of Christ. It is against the freedom guaranteed by the Constitution. It ought to be, and is being, opposed by the best thinking and reasoning people of the country.

ROMISH BOYCOTT.

[From Le Semeur Franco Americain.]

We read what follows in the American Citizen:

Puck has been boycotted by the Roman Catholic Irish; so has this paper; but Puck livs and prospers as no other publication in the country does. The Irish World says, speaking of one of the Western Irish Roman Catholic cities:

A movement has been started in this city not to patronize any business place where Puck is sold. Let us hope the movement may become general.

Now let the American people who are timid see the power of the Roman Catholic Irish, that is so much vaunted. Puck was never more prosperous. It lost nothing by its independent American stand, and gained thousands of Americans who stand ready to assist such independence. We know whereof we speak, and we know how little loss and how much gain there is in an independent American attitude.

I venture to say that Puck deserves to be congratulated on the cordial hatred with which those un-American Irish favor him. Some people, more or less religiously inclined, do not believe in the usefulness of humorous papers. But I am not afraid to say that Puck, by its well-penned editorials and bright, as well as suggestiv, illustrations, has been, and is, a true representativ of American ideas and principles, and does more to foster their growth in our midst than many a so-called religious periodical, this being said without any reference to the politics of the paper.

MATERIAL FOR A DESPOTISM.

[From the Independent.]

The Catholic Telegraph, the diocesan paper of the archdiocese of Cincinnati, had an editorial written by a priest, in which very plain language was used in criticism of the bishops. Immediately Archbishop Elder required Owen Smith, the publisher of the paper, to print an humble apology, and to promis that such an offense should not occur again. He replied that he was sick, and that the columns of the paper were open to his grace, and he begged the archbishop to deal with him gently, as the paper was his family's only means of livelihood. Archbishop Elder replied that sickness was no reason for delaying repentance; that if his family suffered, it was not the archbishop's fault, but the publisher's; and then he dictated a form of most humble apology which he required the publisher to print the very next week on penalty of an edict forbidding his people to take the paper. The apology appeared, the poor Owen Smith adopting exactly the archbishop's words, and promising in the dictated terms that he never again would allow his paper to criticise any of the acts of the bishops of the church, whether right or wrong. The man's mouth was stopped, his paper gagged, and the gag thrust into the teeth of every Catholic newspaper in the United States. They were shown in this instance that no Catholic can publicly criticise his superior, no matter what correction of abuses might follow therefrom. Not a Catholic paper has mentioned this affair of the Catholic Telegraph, and the utmost that any of them has done is to publish editorials showing how indecent it is to venture the disloyalty of finding fault with superiors.

Such a suppression of free speech is a scandal and an atrocity which must make self-respecting men indignant. We cannot understand how they can endure it. And we expect no defense. No Catholic paper would dare to print the article which we print to-day. The writer has to go outside of his church. Evils in that church hav heretofore been corrected by such publicity. We would like to hear from such a paper as the Catholic Review, or the Catholic Mirror, or the Pilot, or the Western Watchman, whether we hav exaggerated the muzzling process applied to the Catholic press. Every one of them, if it ventured to tell the story of the escapade of the Catholic Telegraph, would say that the archbishop did right, and that no failure on the part of the bishops to do their duty, as set forth in the "Acta" on Inamovable Rectors, could palliate the greater evil of criticising the delinquents. Think of it—in the Catholic church of America to expose an evil is a greater evil than the evil exposed.

AN ANGEL CALLETH ON GIDEON.

And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him, and said unto him, The Lord is with thee, thou mighty man of valor.—Judges vi, 12.

Odds and Ends.

IT is no use telling us that there is no humor in the devil. Just look at the way he bags the ministers' sons.

THE ancients had a series of divinities, but the goddess of agriculture was a whole Ceres in herself.—Pittsburgh Chronicle.

"Is your new employer a Christian, Fred?" "No, I'm afraid not. You see he has to use the telephone a great deal."

A CAREFUL study of ancient and modern plates reveals the fact that Mother Eve wore both the modern ball costume and bathing suit, and that she wore them both at once.

"How did the new preacher impress you, Mrs. Fluting?" "He seemed very eloquent and used no notes whatever." "And how did the choir sing?" "Well, just as the minister preached."

CAMP-MEETING exhorter: "Young lady, you should giv your heart to the Lord before it is everlastingly too late." Young lady: "It's too late now. I promised it to Charley Brown down in a hammock over fifteen minutes ago."

"YOUR brother ought to marry. He is too good a man to be wasted." "But he thinks he oughtn't to, you know, because he's a minister." "And why shouldn't a minister marry if he wants to?" "I suppose it is because he may hav a son, and you know what a minister's son usually is."

AN amusing story is told of a young preacher in Texas who astonished his audience by announcing as his text the seventh verse of the third chapter of St. Charles. The slip of the tongue was understood soon after when he was married to a young lady in St. Charles, La.—Louisville Western Recorder.

"MOTHER, did God used to speak to people on this earth?" "Yes." "Well, what's the matter with 'em that he don't talk to 'em now?" "Because in the beginning he said all he wanted to say and all that was necessary." "I bet if he'd been a woman he'd be talkin' yit."—Kentucky State Journal.

Horsethief: "You promis not to interpose any obstacle?"

"MARIA," demanded Mr. Billus, "do you intend to wear that ridiculous hat to church this morning?" "I certainly do, John," replied Mrs. Billus. "This is a lovely hat. There will not be a nicer one there." "If you go to church with that thing, Maria," he stormed, "I'll wear the squeakiest pair of boots I've got!" "I can't help it, John," said his wife, sweetly. Gems of Thought.

WE hav a debt to every great heart, to every fine genius; to those who hav put life and fortune on the cast of an act of justice; to those who hav added new sciences; to those who hav refined life by elegant pursuits.—Emerson.

WHERE would the world be if Infidels had never been?—Ingersoll.

LET us suppose that, instead of "accepting" a revelation, they attempted to prove one by scientific methods. Many questions would hav to be answered, as, for example, what is meant by revelation. If it is the making known of truths by a superhuman method called "inspiration," that process would hav to be described, and the means stated by which inspired thoughts were distinguished from uninspired. The facts would hav to be collected by which might be inferred inductivly the inspiration of any particular writer or speaker. Where are such facts, and how can they be verified? Where, when, and under what circumstances were the "inspired" books written? Giv the verifying evidence for beliefs on these subjects. If it should appear that the writer or teacher was mistaken as to certain facts verifiable by human means, state the reasons for believing he must be correct concerning superhuman facts unverifiable by human means. How, when, and by whom were any particular books chosen and selected from all the other books in existence which hav been "accepted" by multitudes as inspired? By what means did the selectors distinguish between the genuin and the spurious? It is quite evident that these and other such-like questions would be fatal to every supposed revelation. If anyone doubts this, let him try the experiment.—John Wilson, M.A., in Science, Theology, and Ethics.

WHEN the church mythologists established their system, they collected all the writings they could find, and managed them as they pleased. It is a matter altogether of uncertainty to us whether such of the writings as now appear under the name of the Old and New Testament are in the same state in which those collectors say they found them, or whether they added, altered, abridged, or dressed them up. Be this as it may, they decided by vote which of the books out of the collection they had made should be the word of God, and which should not. They rejected several; they voted others to be doubtful, such as the books called the Apocrypha; and those books which had a majority of votes were voted to be the word of God. Had they voted otherwise, all the people since calling themselvs Christians had believed otherwise—for the belief of the one comes from the vote of the other. Who the people were that did all this, we know nothing of. They called themselvs by the general name of the church; and this is all we know of the matter.—Paine.

IT can do truth no service to blink the fact, known to all who hav the most ordinary acquaintance with literary history, that a large portion of the noblest and most valuable moral teaching has been the work, not only of men who did not know, but of men who knew and rejected the Christian faith.—John Stuart Mill.

THE morality of the world is not distinctivly Christian. Zoroaster, Gautama, Mohammed, Confucius, Christ, and, in fact, all founders of religions, hav said to their disciples: You must not steal; you must not murder; you must not bear false witness; you must discharge your obligations. Christianity is the ordinary moral code, plus the miraculous origin of Christ, his crucifixion, his resurrection, his ascension, the inspiration of the Bible, the doctrin of the atonement, and the necessity of belief. Buddhism is the ordinary moral code, plus the miraculous illumination of Buddha, the performance of certain ceremonies, a belief in the transmigration of the soul, and in the final absorption of the human by the infinit. The religion of Mohammed is the ordinary moral code, plus the belief that Mohammed was the prophet of God, total abstinence from the use of intoxicating drinks, a harem for the faithful here and hereafter, ablutions, prayers, alms, pilgrimages, and fasts.—Ingersoll.

THE more reason is improved, the more does it destroy the seeds of religious wars. It is the spirit of philosophy that has banished this plague from the earth.—Voltaire.

AGAINST superstition there is only one weapon, and that weapon is knowledge. When men are ignorant, they must be superstitious; and wherever superstition exists, it is sure to organize itself into some kind of system.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

THE gods dreaded education and knowledge then just as they do now. The church still faithfully guards the dangerous tree of knowledge, and has exerted in all ages her utmost power to keep mankind from eating the fruit thereof. The priests hav never ceased repeating the old falsehood and the old threat: "Ye shall not eat of it, neither shall ye touch it, lest ye die."—Ingersoll.

THE HYPOCRISY OF CHRISTIAN CHARITY.

Notes and Clippings.

A GHOST which has been making a house at Leoni, Mich., uninhabitable, proves to be the same old wind that plays so many curious pranks. In this case it blew the branches of a tree against the weatherboards, and made a noise that sounded like a person opening a door and walking down stairs.

THE Christian Witness is shocked that a colored church in Maryland rented a hall, hired a band, and sold tickets to a prize-fight between two colored brethren. The Witness opines that a prize-fight isn't more out of place than setting up pretty girls to be kissed, at so much a kiss, for the benefit of the church.

A WRITER in the United Service Magazine says that the stones used for scrubbing the decks of ships are called "holy stones," because the work was generally done on Sunday. But a writer in the Churchman says they were so called because those who used them had to go down on their knees to do their work.

A BAPTIST clergyman in Chicago has openly declared his conviction that the devil is an entirely imaginary and fictitious personage. The declaration has raised a considerable stir, and there is a prospect that Chicago may be shaken with a discussion of the question how far belief in the devil is essential to orthodoxy.—World.

CONSIDERING the alacrity with which some of Kansas City's old men, saintly old church-members, jump at Dr. Brown-Sequard's elixir of life, it leaves a suspicion in one's mind that when they sang that good old hymn commencing:

> I would not liv alway,
> I ask not to stay,

they were not quite sincere.—Pueblo Merry World.

IN the Wyoming convention the corporation element carried the day in the fight to levy in the constitution a tonnage royalty on coal mined in the new state. The operativs are the Union Pacific, Colorado Coal & Iron Company, and several lesser organizations. They market two million tons a year from Wyoming and pay only $1,200 taxes. The propositions making eight hours a legal working day and barring foreign police from the state were incorporated into the constitution.

LIBRARIANS of a public library of New York city report that the character of readers has changed materially within a few years. There is a larger proportion of thoughtful students among them, and fewer who read merely to pass away the time. "The library is also more than ever drawn upon by mature scholars, and its record books show a surprising number of visitors from all parts of the United States." The same testimony to an improvement in the character of readers may be heard from librarians in all cities. This, too, is an encouraging sign of the times.

A VERY exciting scene was enacted during the trial of Father O'Dwyer, in Fermoy, under the Crimes act. Father Ferris, a witness for the defense, was asked to swear. He objected, and was told that if he did not wish to swear he must leave the court. Thereupon he demanded: "Which version of the word of God is this? Is it the Protestant version?" Then he dashed the Testament on the desk with the exclamation: "It is a downright insult to ask me to take an oath on a false version of the Bible. I will not take it. I will not be separated from my people." Father Ferris then retired.

THE representation which Father McGlynn recently gave in his speech of the teachers in some parochial schools was instructiv as well as amusing. This is what he said: "Some poor unfortunate man who, having failed to get a job as a janitor or coalheaver, or something of that sort, remembers he got a little schooling as a boy, and thinks he might set his cap for the position of Catholic teacher. And this man, who could not begin to get himself examined as a teacher in the public schools, finds himself acceptable to the good fathers of the parochial school because he is willing to go for $20 a month; and it would be as good as a circus if you could, from behind the door, enjoy a specimen of the beautiful Catholic education that is given in some of these schools."

THE climax of the intensely bitter factional fight between the French and German Catholics of Polk county, Minn., was reached on midnight, the 21st ult., when adherents of Rev. Father Marcil, the rebellious priest who was recently unfrocked and excommunicated by Archbishop Ireland, applied the torch to St. Joseph's church, Red Lake Falls, which, with the contents, including a new organ, was entirely destroyed. That the fire was of incendiary origin, and the firebugs members of the misguided flock led by Father Marcil, there is no doubt, although each faction charges the other with the responsibility for the affair. When he was driven from the church by Archbishop Ireland, Father Marcil threatened to burn the structure unless reinstated. A secret meeting of his adherents was held prior to the discovery of the fire, and those who were first on the scene and broke into the church to save the vestments and silver candelabra, found a can of kerosene beneath the altar, which had been sprinkled with the fluid.

SUPERINTENDENT FRANKLAND, of the Chicago Compulsory Education department, has been trying to get an appropriation from some source to buy clothes and shoes for the children who hav no raiment fit to attend school. He applied to the county board for aid, but that body replied, through the county agent, that the county had no authority to appropriate money for such a purpose. To make matters worse, Mr. Frankland's men gathered up a hundred and thirty youngsters off the South Side streets and placed them last week in the Jones and Hale schools. They came to school so dirty and ragged that the principals were compelled to put them out or suffer the schools to be broken up. On a recent morning one of the officers of the department went up into the neighborhood of the Jones school to gather up the expelled children, when he was surrounded by a mob of them and driven from the scene. He had to make his exit in a lively manner to escape serious injury. He was pelted with stones, hit with sticks, and knocked about in a shameful manner before he made his escape. Mr. Frankland still declares that he will raise the money somehow to fix up the worthy children who are out of the schools so that they can attend.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

CHAPTER I.

CHRISTIAN TESTIMONY.

Dr. J. G. Holland—Hon. Newton Bateman—Rev. J. A. Reed—Rev. James Smith, D.D.—Ninian W. Edwards—Thomas Lewis—Noah Brooks—Rev. Byron Sunderland, D.D.—Rev. Dr. Miner—Rev. Dr. Gurley—Hon. Isaac N. Arnold—F. B. Carpenter—Isaac Hawley—Rev. Mr. Willets—A Pious Nurse—An Illinois Clergyman—Rev. J. H. Barrows, D.D.—Bishop Simpson—Rev. Francis Vinton, D.D.—Robert T. Lincoln.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian? Many confidently believe and earnestly contend that he was, others as confidently believe and as earnestly contend that he was not.

Before attempting to answer this question, let us define what constitutes a Christian. A Christian is one who, in common with the adherents of nearly all the religions of mankind, believes, 1. In the existence of a God; 2. In the immortality of the soul. As distinguished from the adherents of other religions, he believes, 1. That the Bible is a revelation from God to man; 2. That Jesus Christ was the miraculously begotten son of God. He also believes in various other doctrins peculiar to Christianity, the chief of which are, 1. The fall of man; 2. The atonement.

Those who in nominally Christian countries reject the dogmas of Christianity are denominated Infidels, Freethinkers, Liberals, Rationalists, unbelievers, disbelievers, skeptics, etc. These Infidels or Freethinkers represent various phases of bellef, among which are, 1. Deists, who affirm the existence of a God and the immortality of the soul; 2. Atheists, who deny the existence of a God and generally the soul's immortality; 3. Agnostics, who neither affirm nor deny these doctrins.

The following are the religious views Lincoln is said to hav held as presented by those who affirm that he was a Christian:

1. He believed in the existence of a God, and accepted the Christian conception of this being.

2. He believed in the immortality of the soul and in the Christian doctrin of the resurrection.

3. He believed that the Bible is a revelation from God—the only revealed will of God.

4. He believed in the divinity of Christ—believed that Christ is God.

5. He believed in the efficacy of prayer, and was accustomed to pray himself.

6. He believed in the doctrin of experimental religion, and had experienced a change of heart.

7. Although he never united with any church, he was contemplating such a step at the time of his assassination.

8. The church with which he would hav united, we are led to infer, was the Presbyterian.

In confirmation of the claim that Lincoln was a Christian, the following evidence has been adduced:

Dr. J. G. Holland.

President Lincoln died on the 15th of April, 1865. In the same year, the "Life of Abraham Lincoln," written by Dr. J. G. Holland, appeared. In the fields of poetry and fiction and as a magazine writer Dr. Holland had achieved an enviable reputation. His "Life of Lincoln" was written in his usually entertaining style and secured a wide circulation. He affirmed that Lincoln was a Christian, and by means of this work and through Scribner's Magazine, of which he was for many years the editor, contributed more than any other person to render a belief in this claim popular. Referring to Lincoln's administration Dr. Holland says:

The power of a true-hearted Christian man, in perfect sympathy with a true-hearted Christian people, was Mr. Lincoln's power. Open on one side of his nature to all descending influences from him to whom he prayed, and open on the other to all ascending influences from the people whom he served, he aimed simply to do his duty to God and man. Acting rightly he acted greatly. While he took care of deeds fashioned by a purely ideal standard, God took care of results. Moderate, frank, truthful, gentle, forgiving, loving, just, Mr. Lincoln will always be remembered as eminently a Christian president; and the almost immeasurably great results which he had the privilege of achieving were due to the fact that he was a Christian president (Life of Lincoln, p. 542).

Hon. Newton Bateman.

Dr. Holland's claim rests chiefly upon a confession which Lincoln is said to hav made to Newton Bateman in 1860. During the presidential campaign Lincoln occupied the executiv chamber at the state house. Mr. Bateman was superintendent of public instruction at the time, had his office in the same building, and was frequently in Lincoln's room. The conversation in which Lincoln is alleged to hav expressed a belief in Christianity is thus related in Holland's "Life of Lincoln:"

On one of these occasions Mr. Lincoln took up a book containing a careful canvass of the city of Springfield in which he lived, showing the candidate for whom each citizen had declared it his intention to vote in the approaching election. Mr. Lincoln's friends had, doubtless at his own request, placed the result of the canvass in his hands. This was toward the close of October, and only a few days before the election. Calling Mr. Bateman to a seat at his side, having previously locked all the doors, he said: "Let us look over this book. I wish particularly to see how the ministers of Springfield are going to vote." The leaves were turned, one by one, and as the names were examined Mr. Lincoln frequently asked if this one and that were not a minister, or an elder, or the member of such or such a church, and sadly expressed his surprise on receiving an affirmativ answer. In that manner they went through the book, and then he closed it and sat silently and for some minutes regarding a memorandum in pencil which lay before him. At length he turned to Mr. Bateman, with a face full of sadness, and said: "Here are twenty-three ministers, of different denominations, and all of them are against me but three; and here are a great many prominent members of the churches, a very large majority of whom are against me. Mr. Bateman, I am not a Christian—God knows I would be one—but I hav carefully read the Bible, and I do not so understand this book;" and he drew from his bosom a pocket New Testament. "These men well know," he continued, "that I am for freedom in the territories, freedom everywhere as far as the Constitution and laws will permit, and that my opponents are for slavery. They know this, and yet, with this book in their hands, in the light of which human bondage cannot liv a moment, they are going to vote against me. I do not understand it at all." Here Mr. Lincoln paused—paused for long minutes—his features surcharged with emotion. Then he rose and walked up and down the room in the effort to retain or regain his self-possession. Stopping at last, he said, with a trembling voice and his cheeks wet with tears: "I know there is a God, and that he hates injustice and slavery. I see the storm coming, and I know that his hand is in it. If he has a place for me—and I think he has—I believe I am ready. I am nothing, but truth is everything. I know I am right, for Christ teaches it, and Christ is God."

. . . . . .

The effect of this conversation upon the mind of Mr. Bateman, a Christian gentleman whom Mr. Lincoln profoundly respected, was to convince him that Mr. Lincoln had, in his quiet way, found a path to the Christian standpoint—that he had found God, and rested on the eternal truth of God. As the two men were about to separate, Mr. Bateman remarked: "I hav not supposed that you were accustomed to think so much upon this class of subjects. Certainly your friends generally are ignorant of the sentiments you hav expressed to me." He replied quickly: "I know they are. I am obliged to appear different to them; but I think more upon these subjects than upon all others, and I hav done so for years; and I am willing that you should know it" (Life of Lincoln, pp. 236–239).

Rev. J. A. Reed, D.D.

In 1872, seven years after the publication of Holland's work, Lamon's "Life of Abraham Lincoln" was published. In this work the statements of Holland and Bateman concerning Lincoln's religious belief are disputed, and the testimony of numerous witnesses cited to prove that he lived and died a disbeliever. Soon after Lamon's book was published, the Rev. J. A. Reed, a Presbyterian clergyman, of Springfield, Ill., delivered a lecture in which he attempted to refute or modify the evidence of Lamon's witnesses and prove that Lincoln died a Christian. He admitted that Lincoln was an Infidel up to 1848, and possibly as late as 1862, but endeavored to show that previous to his death he changed his views and became a Christian. The following extracts present the salient points in his discourse:

Having shown what claims Mr. Lamon's book has to being the "only fair and reliable history" of Mr. Lincoln's life and views, and of what "trustworthy materials" it is composed, I shall now giv the testimony I hav collected to establish what has ever been the public impression, that Mr. Lincoln was in his later life, and at the time of his death, a firm believer in the truth of the Christian religion. The Infidelity of his earlier life is not so much to be wondered at, when we consider the poverty of his early religious instruction and the peculiar influences by which he was surrounded.

It does not appear that he had ever seen, much less read, a work on the evidences of Christianity till his interview with Rev. Dr. Smith in 1848. We hear of him as reading Paine, Voltaire, and Theodore Parker, but nothing on the other side.

While it is to be regretted that Mr. Lincoln was not spared to indicate his religious sentiments by a profession of his faith in accordance with the institutions of the Christian religion, yet it is very clear that he had this step in view, and was seriously contemplating it, as a sense of its fitness and an apprehension of his duty grew upon him.

In support of his claims, Dr. Reed presents the testimony of Rev. Dr. Smith, Ninian W. Edwards, Thomas Lewis, Noah Brooks, Rev. Dr. Sunderland, Rev. Dr. Miner, and Rev. Dr. Gurley.

Rev. James Smith, D.D.

The Rev. James Smith was for many years pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Springfield. Lincoln formed his acquaintance soon after he located there, remained on friendly terms with him, and with Mrs. Lincoln frequently attended his church. Dr. Smith was one of the three Springfield clergymen who supported Lincoln for president in 1860, and in recognition of his friendship and fidelity, he received the consulship at Dundee. Dr. Reed quotes from a letter to W. H. Herndon, dated East Cainno, Scotland, Jan. 24, 1867, in which Dr. Smith says:

It is a very easy matter to prove that while I was pastor of the First Presbyterian church of Springfield, Mr. Lincoln did avow his belief in the divine authority and inspiration of the scriptures, and I hold that it is a matter of the last importance not only to the present, but all future generations of the great republic, and to all advocates of civil and religious liberty throughout the world, that this avowal on his part, and the circumstances attending it, together with very interesting incidents illustrativ of the excellence of his character, in my possession, should be made known to the public. . . . It was my honor to place before Mr. Lincoln arguments designed to prove the divine authority and inspiration of the scriptures accompanied by the arguments of Infidel objectors in their own language. To the arguments on both sides Mr. Lincoln gave a most patient, impartial, and searching investigation. To use his own language, he examined the arguments as a lawyer who is anxious to reach the truth investigates testimony. The result was the announcement by himself that the argument in favor of the divine authority and inspiration of the scriptures was unanswerable.

Hon. Ninian W. Edwards.

Ninian W. Edwards, a brother-in-law of Lincoln, writes as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, Dec. 24, 1872.

REV. JAS. A. REED, Dear Sir: A short time after the Rev. Dr. Smith became pastor of the First Presbyterian church in this city, Mr. Lincoln said to me, "I hav been reading a work of Dr. Smith on the evidences of Christianity, and hav heard him preach and converse on the subject, and I am now convinced of the truth of the Christian religion."

Yours truly, N. W. EDWARDS.

Thomas Lewis.

In corroboration of Mr. Edwards's statement, Thomas Lewis, of Springfield, Ill., testifies as follows:

SPRINGFIELD, Jan. 6, 1873.

REV. J. A. REED, Dear Sir: Not long after Dr. Smith came to Springfield, and I think very near the time of his son's death, Mr. Lincoln said to me, that when on a visit somewhere, he had seen and partially read a work of Dr. Smith on the evidences of Christianity which had led him to change his views about the Christian religion; that he would like to get that work to finish the reading of it, and also to make the acquaintance of Dr. Smith. I was an elder in Dr. Smith's church, and took Dr. Smith to Mr. Lincoln's office and introduced him; and Dr. Smith gave Mr. Lincoln a copy of his book, as I know, at his own request.

Yours etc., THOS. LEWIS.

Noah Brooks.

Noah Brooks, a newspaper correspondent, of New York, gives the following testimony:

NEW YORK, Dec. 31, 1872.

REV. J. A. REED, My Dear Sir: In addition to what has appeared from my pen, I will state that I hav had many conversations with Mr. Lincoln, which were more or less of a religious character, and while I never tried to draw anything like a statement of his views from him, yet he freely expressed himself to me as having "a hope of blessed immortality through Jesus Christ." His views seemed to settle so naturally around that statement, that I considered no other necessary. His language seemed not that of an inquirer, but of one who had a prior settled belief in the fundamental doctrins of the Christian religion. Once or twice, speaking to me of the change which had come upon him, he said, while he could not fix any definit time, yet it was after he came here, and I am very positiv that in his own mind he identified it with about the time of Willie's death. He said, too, that after he went to the White House he kept up the habit of daily prayer. Sometimes he said it was only ten words, but those ten words he had. There is no possible reason to suppose that Mr. Lincoln would ever deceive me as to his religious sentiments. In many conversations with him, I absorbed the firm conviction that Mr. Lincoln was at heart a Christian man, believed in the savior, and was seriously considering the step which would formally connect him with the visible church on earth. Certainly, any suggestion as to Mr. Lincoln's skepticism or Infidelity, to me who knew him intimately from 1862 till the time of his death, is a monstrous fiction—a shocking perversion.

Yours truly, NOAH BROOKS.

Rev. Byron Sunderland, D.D.

Mr. Reed presents a lengthy letter from the Rev. Byron Sunderland, of Washington, dated Nov. 15, 1872. Dr. Sunderland in company with a party of friends visited the president in the autumn of 1862. In this letter he says:

After some conversation, in which he seemed disposed to hav his joke and fun, he settled down to a serious consideration of the subject before his mind, and for one half-hour poured forth a volume of the deepest Christian philosophy I ever heard.

Rev. Dr. Miner.

The Rev. Dr. Miner, who met Lincoln in Washington, says:

All that was said during that memorable afternoon I spent alone with that great and good man is engraven too deeply on my memory ever to be effaced. I felt certain of this fact, that if Mr. Lincoln was not really an experimental Christian, he was acting like one. He was doing his duty manfully, and looking to God for help in time of need; and, like the immortal Washington, he believed in the efficacy of prayer, and it was his custom to read the scriptures and pray himself.

Rev. Dr. Gurley.

While in Washington, Lincoln with his family attended the Presbyterian church of which the Rev. Dr Gurley was pastor. Mr. Reed cites the following as the testimony of Dr. Gurley in regard to the alleged Infidelity of Lincoln:

I do not believe a word of it. It could not hav been true of him while here, for I hav had frequent and intimate conversations with him on the subject of the Bible and the Christian religion, when he could hav had no motiv to deceive me, and I considered him sound not only on the truth of the Christian religion but on all its fundamental doctrins and teachings. And more than that, in the latter days of his chastened and weary life, after the death of his son Willie, and his visit to the battlefield of Gettysburg, he said, with tears in his eyes, that he had lost confidence in everything but God, and that he now believed his heart was changed, and that he loved the savior, and, if he was not deceived in himself, it was his intention soon to make a profession of religion.

Hon. Isaac N. Arnold

One of the most ardent friends and admirers of Abraham Lincoln was Isaac N. Arnold, for several years a member of Congress from Illinois. Mr. Arnold wrote a work on "Lincoln and Slavery," and a "Life of Lincoln" which was published in 1885. Lincoln's religious views are thus described by Mr. Arnold:

No more reverent Christian than he ever sat in the executiv chair, not excepting Washington. He was by nature religious; full of religious sentiment. The veil between him and the supernatural was very thin. It is not claimed that he was orthodox. For creeds and dogmas he cared little.

But in the great fundamental principles of religion, of the Christian religion, he was a firm believer. Belief in the existence of God, in the immortality of the soul, in the Bible as the revelation of God to man, in the efficacy and duty of prayer, in reverence toward the almighty, and in love and charity to man, was the basis of his religion (Life of Lincoln, p. 446).

His reply to the negroes of Baltimore when they, in 1864, presented him with a magnificent Bible, ought to silence forever those who charge him with unbelief. He said: "In regard to the great book I hav only to say that it is the best gift which God has given to man. All the good from the savior of the world is communicated through this book" (Ibid., p. 447).

His faith in a divine providence began at his mother's knee, and ran through all the changes of his life. Not orthodox, not a man of creeds, he was a man of simple trust in God (Ib., p. 448).

F. B. Carpenter.

Mr. Carpenter, the artist, in his popular book, entitled "Six Months in the White House with Abraham Lincoln," uses the following language:

I would scarcely hav called Mr. Lincoln a religious man, and yet I believe him to hav been a sincere Christian.

Isaac Hawley.

In the spring of 1887, in going from Springfield to Havana, I met Isaac Hawley, one of the early settlers of Illinois, and who for nearly twenty years resided within a few blocks of Lincoln in Springfield. In answer to the question, Was Lincoln a Christian? Mr. Hawley replied:

I believe that Lincoln was a Christian, and that he was God's chosen instrument to perform the mighty work he did.

Rev. Mr. Willets.

The Rev. Mr. Willets, of Brooklyn, N. Y., is credited with the following statement concerning Lincoln's reputed conversion. The information it contains was obtained, it is said, from a lady of Mr. Willets's acquaintance who met Lincoln in Washington:

The president, it seemed, had been much impressed with the devotion and earnestness of purpose manifested by the lady, and on one occasion, after she had discharged the object of her visit, he said to her: "Mrs. ——, I hav formed a high opinion of your Christian character, and now, as we are alone, I hav a mind to ask you to giv me, in brief, your idea of what constitutes a true religious experience." The lady replied at some length, stating that, in her judgment, it consisted of a conviction of one's own sinfulness and weakness, and personal need of a savior for strength and support; that views of mere doctrin might and would differ, but when one was really brought to feel his need of divine help, and to seek the aid of the holy spirit for strength and guidance, it was satisfactory evidence of his having been born again. This was the substance of her reply. When she had concluded, Mr. Lincoln was very thoughtful for a few moments. He at length said, very earnestly, "If what you hav told me is really a correct view of this great subject, I think I can say with sincerity, that I hope I am a Christian" (Anecdotes of Lincoln, pp. 166, 167).

A Pious Nurse.

A pious lady, who served in the capacity of a hospital nurse at Washington, and who sometimes visited the White House, testifies to Lincoln's belief in the efficacy of prayer. The incident narrated occurred while a battle was in progress. The report says:

The possibility of defeat depressed him greatly; but the lady told him he must trust, and that he could at least pray. "Yes," said he, and taking up a Bible, he started for his room. Could all the people of the nation hav overheard the earnest petition that went up from that inner chamber, as it reached the ears of the nurse, they would hav fallen upon their knees with tearful and reverential sympathy (Anecdotes of Lincoln, p. 120).

An Illinois Clergyman.

In the "Lincoln Memorial Album" appears what is reported to be Lincoln's "Reply to an Illinois Clergyman:"

When I left Springfield I asked the people to pray for me. I was not a Christian. When I buried my son, the severest trial of my life, I was not a Christian. But when I went to Gettysburg, and saw the graves of thousands of our soldiers, I then and there consecrated myself to Christ. Yes, I do love Jesus (L. M. A., p. 366).

Rev. John H. Barrows.

In the "Lincoln Memorial Album," Dr. J. H. Barrows contributes an article on "The Religious Aspects of Abraham Lincoln's Career," from which I quote as follows:

In the anxious uncertainties of the great war, he gradually rose to the hights where Jehovah became to him the sublimest of realities, the ruler of nations. When he wrote his immortal proclamation, he invoked upon it not only "the considerate judgment of mankind," but "the gracious favor of almighty God." When darkness gathered over the brave armies fighting for the nation's life, this strong man in the early morning knelt and wrestled in prayer with him who holds in his hand the fate of empires. When the clouds lifted above the carnage of Gettysburg, he gave his heart to the Lord Jesus Christ. When he pronounced his matchless oration on the chief battlefield of the war, he gave expression to the resolve that "this nation, under God, should hav a new birth of freedom." And when he wrote his last inaugural address, he gave to it the lofty religious tone of an old Hebrew psalm (L. M. A., p. 508).

Bishop Simpson.

The most eminent Methodist divine of that period was Bishop Simpson. During the war his commanding influence and rare eloquence did much to secure for the Union cause the united support of Northern Methodists. Lincoln appreciated the services of the distinguished divine, and they became warm friends. When the remains of the president were conveyed to their final resting-place at Springfield, Bishop Simpson was selected to deliver the funeral oration. Alluding to the religious phase of Lincoln's character, he spoke as follows:

As a ruler, I doubt if any president has ever shown such trust in God, or in public documents so frequently referred to divine aid. Often did he remark to friends and to delegations that his hope for our success rested in his conviction that God would bless our efforts because we were trying to do right (Lincoln and Slavery, p. 673).

Rev. Francis Vinton, D.D.

This clergyman, a resident of New York, and a stranger to Lincoln, visited the White House in 1862, it is claimed, and indulged in an argument and exhortation, the effect of which was to convert the president to a belief in the Christian doctrin of the resurrection and the immortality of the soul. During the interviews, Lincoln, it is reported, fell upon the neck of his clerical visitor and wept like a child. Before retiring, Dr. Vinton said: "I hav a sermon upon this subject which I think might interest you." "Mr. Lincoln," the report continues, "begged him to send it at an early day, thanking him repeatedly for his cheering and hopeful words. The sermon was sent, and read over and over by the president, who caused a copy to be made for his own private use before it was returned" (Anecdotes of Lincoln, pp. 107, 108).

Robert T. Lincoln.

Some years ago the writer of this wrote an article in which it was asserted that Lincoln once composed a small work on Infidelity. A gentleman in Ohio disputed the fact, and appealed to Robert, asking him if the statement was true. Mr. Lincoln replied in a brief note, which appeared in a local paper, published at Leesville, O. I hav been unable to obtain a copy of this note, but I recall the most important words, which are as follows: "My father never wrote a book on Infidelity." JOHN E. REMSBURG.

HARRIET MARTINEAU—CONTINUED.

The next important evolution in the life of Harriet Martineau was her study of the doctrin of necessity and her final acceptance of it. She says: "All the best minds I know are among the necessarians. . . . All human action proceeds on the supposition that all the workings of the universe are governed by laws which cannot be broken by human will. . . . The constitution and action of the human faculty and will are determined by influences beyond the power of the possessor."

She finally gave up prayer, not only as useless, but because she really did not know what was most to be desired. She says: "A long series of grave misfortunes brought me to this conviction, that there is no saying beforehand what the external conditions of peace really are. I found myself now and then in the loftiest moods of cheerfulness when in the midst of circumstances I had most dreaded, and the converse. I felt it was better to take the chances of being damned than be always quaking one's self in the fear of it."

Who of us hav not felt the same? We hav all found the terror so dreaded to be not only a mere nothing when realized, but even opening the door to a higher happiness than we hav hitherto known. Oft it is hard to become indifferent to the events of the yet-to-come and to cease hoping and fearing.

When Harriet was nineteen years of age her brother James left for college, and finding her so miserable during his absence, he advised her to write for the press something for the Monthly Repository. So she wrote a letter on "Female Writers on Practical Divinity," signing it "V," and taking it quietly to the office herself. She was greatly excited when it was not only printed, but in Notices to Correspondents a request made "to hear more from 'V' of Norwich." She says: "There is certainly something entirely peculiar in the sensation of seeing one's self in print for the first time. The lines burn themselvs in upon the brain in a way of which black ink is incapable in any other mode." And when her Brother James came home and eulogized the article highly before he knew who had penned it, her happiness was completed. Harriet wrote as Cobbett advises—"First, know what to say, then say it in the first words that occur to you"—making her first copy the only one. Her "Traditions of Palestine" first made her name known in literature, though she had before earned considerable sums by fugitiv writings on various subjects. In 1830 the British and Foreign Unitarian Association offered prizes for the three best tracts "on the introduction and Promotion of Christian Unitarianism among the Roman Catholics, the Jews, and Mohammedans." She competed for all three and won them all, though three separate sets of judges were appointed to compare the merits of the various essays. She wrote stories, tracts, and articles on all sorts of subjects—political, religious, moral, and the home, and a series of stories for children called "The Playfellow." She was thoroughly Liberal and progressiv—antislavery and anti to all wrongs, errors, and evils. She had a loving, heartful, earnest, admiration of America and her people, but abhorred slavery as every true Liberal must do. She was eminently utilitarian, and even when prostrated on a bed of sickness she utilized her sufferings by writing a series of essays entitled, "Life in a Sick Room." During her illness in 1840 she was offered a pension from the English government as an acknowledgment of her services as a political writer, and the good she has accomplished by teaching the masses true political economy. She declined the pension because it came from the government, "which did not represent the people." In 1848 she published "Eastern Life," and in this work she first gave public expression to her radical heterodox opinions and testified her disbelief in divine revelation. The shock to her Christian friends was terrible, but it was as a mere nothing "compared to that given them three years later by the publication of the letters between herself and H. G. Atkinson on the 'Laws of Man's Nature and Development,' in which she plainly avows her Atheistical opinions." Like all who reach a newer and broader plane of thought, she was made happier by the growth of ideas. All through this book "there was a tone of glad defiance of what the world may choose to think of her, and of restful triumph over her own educational prejudices." Who of us that hav outgrown old traditions and beliefs hav not felt just this same glad jubilation of freedom and self-gratulation?

Speaking of how it affected friends when the letters came out, she says: "Some spoke coldly for a time; and one family, from whom more wisdom might hav been expected, ceased to visit me, while continuing on friendly terms." When I went out to meet the midnight on the terrace or in bad weather on the porch, and saw and felt what I always do see and feel there at that home, what did it matter whether people who were nothing to me had smiled or frowned as I passed them in the village in the morning? When I experienced the still new joy of feeling myself to be a portion of the universe resting on the security of its everlasting laws, certain that its cause was wholly out of the sphere of human attributes, and that the special destination of my race is infinitly nobler than the highest proposed under a scheme of 'divine moral government,' how could it matter to me that the adherents of a decaying mythology—the Christian following the heathen as the heathen followed the barbaric fetich—were fiercely clinging to their man god, their scheme of salvation, their reward and punishment, their arrogance, their selfishness, their essential pay system, as ordered by their mythology? As the astronomer rejoices in new knowledge which compels him to giv up the dignity of our globe as the center, the pride, and even the final cause of the universe, so do those who hav escaped from Christian mythology enjoy their release from the superstition which fails to make happy, fails to make good, fails to make wise, and has become as great an obstacle in the way of progress as the prior mythologies which it took the place of nearly two thousand years ago."

Religious Conservatism.

Ignatius Donnelly in Atlantis.

The essence of religion is conservatism; little is invented; nothing perishes; change comes from without; and even when one religion is supplanted by another its gods liv on as the demons of the new faith, or they pass into the folk-lore and fairy stories of the people. We see Votan, a hero of America, become the god Odin, or Woden, in Scandinavia; and when his worship as a god dies out Odin survives (as Dasent has proved) in the Wild Huntsman of the Hartz, and in the Robin Hood (Odin) of popular legend. The Hellequin of France becomes the Harlequin of our pantomimes. William Tell never existed; he is a myth; a survival of the sun-god Apollo, Indra, who was worshiped on the altars of Atlantis. The rite of circumcision dates back to the first days of Phœnicia, Egypt, and the Cushites. It, too, was probably an Atlantean custom, invented in the stone age. Tens of thousands of years hav passed since the stone age; the ages of copper (in America), bronze, and iron hav intervened; and yet to this day the Hebrew rabbi performs the ceremony of circumcision with a stone knife.

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

A One Thousand Dollar Prize Manual.

The American Secular Union, a voluntary association having for its object the complete separation of church and state, in practice as well as in profession, and in no way committed to any system of religious belief or disbelief, acting herein by its president, Richard B. Westbrook, A.M., LL.D., as its special trustee and attorney-in-fact, hereby offer a premium of One Thousand Dollars ($1,000), lawful money of the United States, for the best essay, treatis, or manual adapted to aid and assist teachers in our free public schools and in the Girard College for orphans, and other public and charitable institutions professing to be unsectarian, to thoroughly instruct children and youth in the purest principles of morality without inculcating religious doctrins, thus recognizing the legal right under our Federal Constitution of all our citizens, Jews and Gentiles, Catholics and Protestants, Liberals and Agnostics, and all other classes, whether believers or disbelievers, to hav their children instructed in all the branches of a common Secular education in our state schools, without having their tender minds biased for or against any sect or party whatever.

It is desired that the manual for which this premium is offered shall not be a reading book for schools nor a mere code of morals, much less a system of ethical philosophy, but rather a concise yet comprehensiv and suggestiv exhibit, with familiar and practical illustrations, of those universal foundation principles and axiomatic truths which underlie all sound morality and rightfulness, thus developing and educating that inherent moral sense which is more or less common to all rational human beings. In short, to show how to teach children the natural and essential difference between right and wrong, and the reasons therefor, without reference to sacerdotal creeds and sectarian dogmas, is the chief object to be kept in mind in writing for this premium; as it is the unquestionable right of every taxpayer and citizen of this free republic to hav his children educated in our common schools without having their minds prejudiced on those disputed subjects which may safely be intrusted to the family, the churches, and the Sunday-schools, where they properly belong.

While each writer will be expected to confine himself or herself to the main object of this offer, the widest practical freedom in the form and range of treatment will be allowed, but all prejudice and partisanship regarding current controversies should be scrupulously avoided.

The manual should not contain less than sixty thousand words, nor more than one hundred thousand, though these limits will not be insisted upon in a work of special merit.

The papers should all be submitted by April 1, 1890, though more time will be granted if necessary; but the committee will be ready to receive manuscripts by the 1st day of January, 1890.

Each manuscript shall be in type-writing, or at least should be very legibly written to insure a careful reading, and should hav a special mark or designation, and the name and post-office address of the author should be sent at the same time in a sealed envelope, not to be opened until after the award is made, bearing the same mark, and both addressed to R. B. Westbrook, No. 1707 Oxford street, Philadelphia, Pa., post or express prepaid. Unaccepted manuscripts will be returned to the writers at their own expense, and the accepted manuscript shall become the exclusiv property of the Union, to be held in trust by the trustee herein named, and the premium of $1,000 will be promptly paid, without discount, when the copyright is thus secured. The money is now on deposit in trust with the Guarantee Trust and Safe Deposit Company in Philadelphia for the object contemplated.

A representativ and impartial committee shall in due time be carefully selected by the subscribers to this fund or a majority of them, to act as judges of the manuscripts submitted and to award the prize. The trustee herein named shall be a member and the chairman of said committee, whether he continues in the presidency of the American Secular Union or not.

Writers of all nations are invited to join in the friendly contest, and the award will be made without regard to nationality or sex.

Freethought in Sweden.

Our Freethinking friends in Sweden are activ as ever. Sunday, August 4th, they held their first annual congress, which was largely attended, and it was resolved to send a delegate, possibly Captain Thomson, of Eshilstuna, to represent the society at the Freethought congress in Paris. The society, which numbers twelve hundred members, is divided into several local branches, the most prominent of which, the Stockholm branch, has hired a large hall and secured the services of an excellent male quartet. The following incident will show what kind of Freethinkers they hav in "ultimate Thule." Mr. V. Lennstrand was advertised for a lecture at Tenebro, a small seaport at the Baltic sea. He arrived, but no room, neither in nor outside a house, was to be got in the city. Yet our friends lost not courage; a lecture they expected and were going to hav. They hired a steamer, and from the captain's bridge Mr. Lennstrand delivered the lecture to his audience on board.

Fritankaren, the Swedish Freethinkers' organ, edited by Mr. Lennstrand, is a vigorous eight-page paper, which mercilessly attacks orthodoxy. The comments made by its editor resemble closely those of the "man with the badge-pin," while the general "make-up" of the paper would do honor to even an older journalist than its editor. No 3. of Fritankaren, the recipients of which we are, contains, besides minor criticisms, an open letter of remonstrance from Mr. V. E. Lennstrand to the king, in which he calls the latter's attention to the injustice he has suffered, and an excellent translation by O. T. (Capt O. Thomson) of a fragment of one of Colonel Ingersoll's lectures.

Mr. A. Lindquist, Mr. Lennstrand's former coworker in the cause of Freethought, has fallen back in grace. After several attempts at hindering the progress of the cause, he at last showed his true colors, and published malignant accusations against the society and its leaders, for which conduct he was summarily expelled from the society. We wish Mr. V. E. Lennstrand and his worthy co-laborers all possible success.

A Significant Fact.

It seems to me a significant fact that King Humbert has sent a bronze crown to be placed on Garibaldi's tomb. This was announced in a press dispatch to the Tribune on Thursday.

This would certainly look as if the king of Italy is disposed to show to the pope that he is not likely to make any apologies for permitting the statue to Bruno to be erected in Rome. It was Garibaldi who took the initiativ in depriving the pope of his temporal power. When, therefore, the pope is so greatly exercised over the insult, as he calls it, to the church, it speaks well for the courage of King Humbert that he publicly pays tribute to the memory of the man who made it possible that a statue of Bruno could be erected in the Holy City. The Origin of Christianity.

Marcion, in the second century, referring to Paul's ten epistles as his authority, denounced Jehovah, and protested against the substitution of anything Jewish for the primitiv faith of the Asiatic church. Tertullian, a member of the same church, and a zealous advocate of the substitution, proclaimed Paul and Marcion heretics. But after Marcion's death, when Paul had been dead for two centuries, he changed his tactics, and declared that Marcion had misrepresented Paul's epistles, and then professed to quote them correctly, making them advocate the measures Paul had always opposed.

Paul had, as opponents, all the chief apostles of his day (but he knew nothing of the fabulous Jesus and the string of names that are paraded as his apostles), and for centuries the hatred of him was intense; for the higher church officials must hav been familiar with his history, and knew that the epistles circulated in his name were not his. Hence Peter was made the head of the church, though Paul's corrupted epistles must hav been largely instrumental in the change of faith which was accomplished in the third century. I hav seen it stated that the Romish church cherished its hatred of Paul for a thousand years. What other explanation than the above can be given of this single fact, which cannot be set aside by anyone who would study intelligently the epistles attributed to Paul?

But it must hav been an easy matter for the church, in its supremacy under Constantine, to destroy Paul's original epistles, which, in the absence of printing, could never hav been numerous.

Tertullian's hatred of Marcion was eminently serviceable to Paul's memory. To Marcion might appropriately be applied the familiar lines of the Roman poet: "Integer vitæ, scelerisque purus," etc. A man of strict integrity, free from all vices, of commanding intellect, consistency, and courage. Just the person to excite the hatred of a religious fanatic like Tertullian, who soon abandoned the new faith he had advocated with such zeal, and became a follower of Montanus, who, claiming to be the Holy Ghost, or comforter promised in the gospel, by the fabulous Jesus, founded a new sect.

But we are told that "the writings of Tertullian are probably fourteenth century forgeries, and we can know nothing certain of Marcion." Well, we are burrowing into a period purposely obscured by Christianity—an age of fraud, forgeries, and supernatural events. But one fact we are sure of—that Jesus and his apostles never lived, and that all our gospels and the Acts, so far as they relate to them, are pure fiction. They do not even conform to those passages of the Old Testament of which they profess to be a fulfillment. Hence, our Jordan is a very hard road to travel—all the guideboards obscure, covered with puzzling inscriptions, and pointing nowhere. Even Peter, the rock on which the church is founded, is enveloped in such a mist of uncertainty that we must always question him. And Paul we should doubt, did not Marcion's indorsement "giv the world assurance of a man." But what motiv could Tertullian hav had to fabricate such a personage as Marcion, and how could anyone hate so cordially the production of his own brain? The intensity of the hatred is proof of the existence of its subject.

I hav given the reason why, in my opinion, Peter was recognized as the head of the church instead of Paul. Peter, on whose name the pun is made in Matt. xvi, 18, represents Paul's chief opponent in the controversy which ended in the triumph of the anti Paulist party in the third century. If Christians recognize Peter as the head of the church on the strength of that passage, they should acknowledge Judas Iscariot as its first, and Matthias as its second bishop, on the twentieth and twenty-sixth verses of Acts i.

But it seems to me that the time has come when Infidels should ignore the stories of old carpenters who dream of angels from another world, or of young ones who claim to hav been promised by devils all the glories of this one, and all the other nonsense of the New Testament, and look into the history of those times for facts that may reveal the origin of the great crime against humanity which is as formidable to-day as it was eighteen hundred years ago, and claims the right to educate every child born in the republic into subserviency to a corrupt priesthood.

S. PALMER.

The Benevolent Incendiary.

From Charles Bradlaugh's National Reformer.

A farmer awoke suddenly one night amid the crackling of flames. A friendly stranger who had forced his way into the burning farmhouse to arouse him, stood beside his bed and called on him to escape at once before it was too late. He did so, and reached the open air in safety, though bewildered and dazed by the fire and smoke. Suddenly he thought he heard his children calling for help. Seizing his rescuer's hand with mingled sensations of gratitude and terror, he pointed to an attic window round whose thatched eaves the flames were already playing.

"They shall be rescued," said the brave but unknown friend; "I hav a ladder ready—I provided it beforehand."

With the farmer's help he raised this ladder to the window where a girl was screaming to the distracted father to save her from the terrible flames. The benevolent stranger was the first to ascend. He took the girl in his arms and brought her down in a fainting condition. The farmer now rushed up the ladder, but no sign of his boys or of their mother could he behold amidst the blazing mass of fire that filled the upper rooms and drove him back, scorched, blinded, and sick of heart. He sought the noble stranger—who for some reason or other was dragging a blazing fagot across the farmyard—and cried out to him in despair, "What must I do, man, to save them?"

"All is over as far as they are concerned," coolly replied the stranger; "their time is past. Be thankful for your own safety."

"Is there naught I can do?"

"Take this brand from the burning," answered the stranger solemnly, "and set fire to yonder haystacks while I fire the wheat ricks and the barns and stables."

"What!" exclaimed the farmer, almost paralyzed with astonishment, "burn the whole farm down?"

"Yea," said the benevolent stranger, "for what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

"Art thou mad?" cried the bewildered farmer.

"The world has always called me so," said the stranger, with a fanatical smile of calm assurance and infinit superiority illumining his benignant countenance, "but it is the world itself that is mad to take thought for the morrow as it does. For verily I say unto you, ye shall not lay up treasures upon earth, but in heaven only; for where your treasure is there is your heart also. Only by losing this world can ye win the next."

"Good God!" exclaimed the farmer, struck by a horrible suspicion, "hav I been in the hands of a lunatic all this time? Was it you that set fire to the house?"

"Yea," replied the lunatic calmly, "I burnt your family that I might show forth my mercy by saving one of them."

"You infernal villain!"

"Nay," said the lunatic, "is there not more joy in heaven over one person saved than over ninety and nine that need no saving?"

The farmer, able to restrain himself no longer, here felled the lunatic to the ground with a tremendous blow of his fist.

Next day he handed the incendiary over to the police, and lamented, as he gazed at the ashes of his home, that so dangerous a person had ever been let loose. Enough of his corn ricks had been saved to preserve him from absolute starvation, but his losses were terrible, and some of them were so irreparable that the tears ran down his rugged face and his voice was choked with sobs as he thought of them. His daughter indeed was saved, but she never entirely recovered from the shock of that dreadful night. The circumstances of her rescue are indelibly stamped upon her imagination, and are often repeated in her dreams. She still speaks of the stranger in terms of the most ardent gratitude and admiration, and cannot bear to hear anything said against him. Any attempt to depict the beloved hero of her imagination in his true colors results in such violent symptoms of hysteria that no one ventures to approach so dangerous a subject in her hearing.

MORAL: (1) Making a hell in order to save a few from its fiery torments does not really deserve very special gratitude toward the maker and ordainer of such an everlasting conflagration. (2) As man barely succeeded in rescuing the remains of civilization, literature, freedom, and science from destruction by Christianity in the dark ages of its undoubted supremacy, it behoves him to beware of trusting to the other-world lunacy again, lest worse befall.

W. P. BALL.

The Work Goes Bravely On.

From the Western American.

The municipal authorities of Chicago are doing well. Since last April they hav endeavored to do their very best for the Roman-Irish minority that did not place them in power, and the success that has attended their efforts to play second fiddle to a gang of Roman-Irish priests has been such as to make the Roman conspirators feel very chipper, and in the recesses of their convents or parsonages they quaff their wine, punch one another in the ribs, and laugh at the idiotic fools, known as Americans, that they are so easily able to hoodwink. They are in high glee; with less than one-seventh of the voters they hold ninety per cent of the salaried places.

They should laugh, for they hav no hard work to do all this. Their success arises from, first, the cowardice of the average business men, who fear that eminently Christian weapon, the boycott. Second, the cowardice of truckling state and national politicians. Third, the facility with which the Roman corporation sustains "the ancient subjection," by using threats of eternal damnation and preventing intelligent education in our public schools, and compelling its laity to support and send their children to their parochial schools. This enables them to solidify their twenty thousand votes, use it as a commercial commodity, and sell it to the highest bidder. Fourth, by intimidating and gagging the daily press, securing the press agents throughout the country, they hav managed for years to control and abuse political power in many cities and rob taxpayers without mercy.

They compel officials, born in the United States and educated as Protestants, to do acts that would disgrace the king of Dahomey. Here in Chicago the work is going on every day. The present administration, since its advent to power, has distinguished itself by wallowing at the feet of Roman priests and obeying their slightest wish. It commenced by ostracising every placeholder that belonged to the Patriotic Order of Sons of America, all who belonged to the American League, all Orangemen, all who belonged to any society that marched under the stars and stripes, and was sworn to support and defend the Constitution of the nation and state.

The many changes in all departments, and especially in the police force, show that the fact of being a nativ American and a Protestant or Freethinker totally unfits a man to draw pay from the treasury of Chicago. It is evident that an old saying has been reversed, and the dictum now is, "No American need apply." No one can help noticing that when an American goes off the police force an Irishman goes on. That this is the result of design no one can deny, and should lead the great majority of citizens to do a bit of thinking. Ninety per cent of the police are of Irish birth or the sons of Irishmen and Romanists, while they represent less than one-seventh of the voters in the city. This one fact should be cause for alarm, and no prudent people would permit one race and one religion to hav the preponderance in the only armed force we hav for the preservation of the peace.

To giv our readers a good idea as to how this plan is being carried out, we call attention to one station. There are attached to the station fifty policemen. Forty-eight are Irish Romanists, two Germans, and one American. This American was a subscriber to the Western American and read it at the station-house, as he had a right to do under the Constitution. He was a member of the American League and the Patriotic Order of Sons of America. September 2d he is notified that he is dismissed from the force, no charges and no fault of any kind alleged against him as regards the rules of the force. He goes out and his place is filled by an Irish Romanist, who is there to aid the priests in maintaining "the ancient subjection."

How They Like Comstock.

From the New York Sun.

HAINES FALLS, N. Y., Sept. 7th.—Authony Comstock, chief of the Society for the Suppression of Vice, was one of the thousands who spent their vacation in the Catskills this year. He stayed over a mouth at Tannersville, one of the most popular spots in the mountains, and during that time acted in such a conspicuously disagreeable manner that when he went home last week there was a universal sigh of relief at what the mountain folks declared to be a "good riddance." Hotel-keepers, country merchants, and visitors alike all complained that the moment Comstock reached the beautiful region he began in the most unpleasant fashion to boss the village of Tannersville. . . .

Comstock cried to Storekeeper Wiltse in a harsh voice, "You keep your store open on Sundays here, and I'll arrest you for that if you don't close up hereafter." Wiltse's face grew crimson. He resolutely defied Comstock to close the store. Wiltse is a druggist as well as a general merchant, and, furthermore, he has the Western Union telegraph office in his store, and he knew that this fact would protect him against the Sunday law section of the penal code that Comstock was trying to spring on him. Comstock sputtered around awhile longer. The villagers said that Comstock was acting purely from spite, and Mr. Wiltse said so, too, but with greater emphasis.

"Mr. Comstock's interference . . . " he said yesterday, "was prompted simply by a mean desire to get even with me because I would not let him boss my business when I was postmaster last summer. He came nosing around as soon as he arrived, and demanded that I should let him examin all the mail before it was delivered to guests. 'I'm an inspector of mails,' he said. You may fancy that the guests were highly delighted when they heard that the man whose supervision of the mails was always exercised solely on the suspicion that there might be obscene matter in the letters had made a demand to see their letters before they themselvs had a chance to examin them. I refused point-blank, and told him that I knew my business. Then he demanded that I should delay the mails so that he could get his letters in after the hour for closing had arrived. He insisted upon this extraordinary privilege so often that I wrote to Superintendent Jackson in the New York post-office, asking if I should hold back the whole mail to oblige Mr. Comstock. Superintendent Jackson telegraphed back a decided negativ to the proposition. Mr. Comstock has apparently never forgiven me for this slap in the face, and he shows how meanly he can cherish a grudge. New Yorkers hav come to me since and said that Comstock's action was wildly absurd as well as malicious."

So intense was the feeling aroused by the conduct of Comstock and another player of his team in the bowling match, that only the presence of the ladies prevented two of the Sunset View players, one of them Zany Brewer, a man known far and wide through the Catskill mountains alike for kind-heartedness and great physical strength, from knocking Comstock down. Comstock challenged the accuracy of the score kept by Proprietor Joe Haines in a dictatorial manner, and didn't apologize when his challenge was demonstrated to be unfounded in fact. He disputed the rulings of the referee and behaved generally in a manner that disgusted the ladies present.

A Great Sentiment.

Dr. Monroe in the Ironclad Age.

Life is so short that no sensible man has a moment to spare in plotting the injury of his fellow-man.

An Attractiv Invitation.

George Macdonald in San Francisco Freethought.

I hear that the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, who is just convalescing after an attack of typhoid fever, is not getting his strength back so rapidly as he could wish. The fever has left him full of rheumatism, neuralgia, and toothache. I understand that Dr. Monroe, of the Ironclad Age, has sent him a bottle of his Blood Feeder, which the sufferer is unable to take on account of its being put up in a solvent prohibited by total abstinence principles. In view of this state of affairs, and in view of this state of California, I hav extended to the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER a warm, or semi-tropical invitation to visit the coast and recuperate. We offer many inducements. Just at this season of the year the weather is full of attractions. The winds hav blown themselvs out, and the sand dunes are no longer in a state of eruption. The atmosphere is full of smoke; the sun, penetrating the haze, tints everything to the color of red and gold, and opaque objects cast purple shadows on the ground. It is a trifle too warm to wear a coat, and too cool for shirtsleeves, so that the resident is afforded all the varieties of sensation that lie between a sweat and a sneeze.

If the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER will come here I will extend to him the freedom of the city. He can make ascensions in the cable cars, or take a voyage to Oakland and see Mr. Schou. I will hav the Salvation Army sing for him in front of the old Adelphi Theater. I will show him the picturesque ruin we use for a post-office, and other ruins which are not picturesque who came to California to make their fortunes and failed to realize on their expectations. He shall go with me for a sail on the bay, where the porpoises gambol away their hard earnings, and to the Stock Exchange on Pine street, where that other kind of fish known as the sucker gambles away his hard borrowings. He shall see the hoodlum hoodling in his haunt; the government mule from the Presidio; the pig-tailed heathen from the orient. I will show him the vaquero galloping through Kearny street, the rampant cowboy and the terror from Tuolumne clubbed into a docil frame of mind by an insignificant policeman. He may view the audacious seagull reincarnated in the chicken tamale. He may revel in peaches, grapes, watermelons, and Jamaica ginger. He may hunt the alert and fugitiv flea, dare the tarantula with a club, and stand off the church beggar with an arquebuse.

So shall his mind be diverted and his body strengthened. He shall return to his scorched and frozen and stormy island home, full of flea bites, enthusiasm, and tender recollections.

Lectures and Meetings.

FROM August 16th to September 16th J. E. Remsburg delivered thirty-six lectures. Dak.; Valley City, N. Dak.; Jamestown, N. Dak.; Henry, S. Dak.

AS THE TRUTH SEEKER reaches its New York readers two days before its formal date, there is time to remind them that the Manhattan Liberal Club reassembles this week, Friday, and that the unsuspected pastor of an orthodox church, all unmindful of the pope's mental condition, will talk about Bruno, and an era of fraternity. Mr. Sampson is one of the few clergymen in New York whose congregation allows association with heretics; therefore, it is worth while to hear him, aside from his eloquence and erudition. The Liberal Club, under the presidency of Dr. Foote, Jr., promises this winter to increase its good reputation as an awakener and instructor of the people. It will from now till next summer meet every Friday evening at 8 o'clock, at 220 East 15th st.

Authenticity of the Bible.

In the book of Genesis we hav a specimen of the character of the Pentateuch or the five books of Moses. Let us pause here and make some inquiry and research as to who was their author, and when or where they were written. They are all anonymous writings. If these books contain the word of God, it is certainly very important that the man that wrote that word of God should tell us definitly who he is and what is his name. Histories and standard works of all kinds, both ancient and modern, are signed by their authors, and these books above all others should hav been signed with the name of the writer or writers.

There are two principal characters in these writings, namely God and Moses. Now, it is nowhere claimed that God ever wrote one word of the Bible. For some time it was claimed that Moses wrote the Pentateuch, but that claim has been generally exploded, and among the better class of theologians the belief that he was the author is now almost universally repudiated. Centuries after Christianity began some priest originated the story that the scriptures were the word of God. No mortal man knows now, or ever did know, what words God uttered. It is a bold and impious assertion for any man to make, and the man that asserts positivly that the Bible is the word of God has no means of verifying the truth of that assertion. For no one man knows anything more about deity than another, either in this or any other age.

Draper says what is true: "The books of Moses nowhere claim the authorship of one man, or make the impious declaration that they are the writings of almighty God," or even inspired by him. We are often told by the pulpit that God revealed himself to a man by the name of Moses. What proof is there to sustain this story? None whatever, only the word of the man that wrote the five books of Moses, whoever he is. Is the simple word of some writer entirely unknown sufficient to convince us of the most wonderful and extraordinary events? Among the tribes of degraded and superstitious Jews of which this writer wrote the history, murder, adultery, bigamy, treachery, assassination, and the like were not considered. crimes or evils any more than among Apache Indians. The writers of the Bible boast of the doing of these crimes and wickedness among their people, and in many instances say their God assisted in and advised them to be done. Is it strange then that these ignorant and superstitious savages should lie? The author of these books givs the character of Moses in the following words: "And he espied an Egyptian smiting a Hebrew. And he looked this way and that way, and when he saw there was no one, he slew the Egyptian and buried him in the sand" (Ex. xi, 11, 12). A short time after this (verses 13, 14) he found two Hebrews smiting each other. Here, from the language used by one of the combatants, "Intendest thou to kill me as thou killest the Egyptian?" he was about to commit a second murder, but he got frightened and said, "Surely this thing is known." Pharaoh's officers attempted to arrest him for murder but he fled the country, and was a fugitiv from justice for forty years. This record shows plainly that this murder was committed in cold blood. After looking this way and that and seeing no one, he deliberately murdered the man and buried his body in the sand, and then attempts a second murder further along in the book We read that he married an Ethiopian woman, having a wife and family still living. The Christian world accepts the word of this murderer and bigamist, unsupported by any other testimony either ancient or modern, when he, through the author, tells us wonderful tales of the supernatural and the violation of the laws of nature.

Bible scholars and critics hav long since decided that the book of Genesis is founded upon legends. How could it be otherwise when it was not written until at least four thousand years after the event recorded in the book occurred, and during that time, according to the Bible, there was a flood that destroyed every human being but Noah and his family? The writer must necessarily write from legends and traditions, or from imagination. The writer then, without giving his name or any account of his birth or parentage, without reference or vouchers for his honesty and truthfulness, writes a history of miracles, of wonders, of horrible deeds, of absurdities, and of stories more simple than nursery tales, done by a being he calls God, Lord God, Jehovah, and other names that no one ever heard of until this author wrote this book; and, strange to say, there are quite a number of people in this age gullible enough to believe them. But if such a book was written to-day by a credible author, and witnesses furnished to prove the truth of these miraculous and wonderful occurrences, these same people almost to a man would refuse to believe them true.

Then, to this unknown writer, without a history or a name, so far as we know, and to him alone, is the Christian world indebted for the being he called God. And to the barbarous and savage tribes of Jews, of whom this author wrote the history in this book, are they indebted for the Bible.

This nation of wandering savages furnished Christianity with a God. Christianity offered to supply the Jews with a similar being, but they rejected the offer with scorn.

Many of the ancient philosophers of renown had their ideas and notions of the soul, gods, and creation of the world; so some monk, priest, or Jew, long after these ancient philosophers had written their theory of creation, writes the Mosaic account, as it is called, in the Bible.

"A self-existent God may be as unthinking as self-existent matter." And why not suppose that the universe is self-existent and eternal as well as Israel's God? It would seem to be easier, for we can see the former but not the latter. And we know the earth existed long before anyone heard of its alleged creator. The time in which the Old Testament was written is wrapped in mystery.

The Bible informs us that Jerusalem was repeatedly sacked and pillaged between the year 168 B C. and the Christian era, and at one time every copy of the Book of the Law (not the Old Testament) was burnt.

By that it seems up to this time all the Bible that existed was copies of the Mosaic law, and they were burnt, at least all that could be found. (See Maccabees.) Then up to a century before Christ there was no Bible known to be in existence. This is about the time that Esdras says he and five others wrote two hundred books by inspiration, as the others had been destroyed. It does not say what others, but as the law of Moses had been destroyed, he must hav meant that. It is but little difference what he meant, as this story is in the Apocrypha and is not authentic.

Webster givs the word in Greek, and says it means hidden, spurious books which are not considered a part of the sacred canon of the scriptures. What are these spurious books doing among the holy and inspired writings of almighty God?

Gibbon says about this time divine inspiration was liberally bestowed on women, elders, and boys, as well as bishops. When they were in proper state to receive it they were transported out of their senses. They being then organs of the Holy Ghost, I would suggest that to be the only and proper condition for a person to be in is to be the organ of the Holy, or any other ghost. "Transported out of their senses" something like the old-fashioned hallelujah spasms, I suppose.

If it was necessary to inspire the writer, it was equally necessary to inspire the translator so he would translate correctly, and the readers also, some of them with a double dose to make them believe these marvelous stories.

The pulpit has made a great point of and rung all the changes on the antiquity of the Bible. There were immense libraries in existence before this book was written, and many of the books, or fragments of them, are extant at this time. Æsop's Fables are much older, so is the "Arabian Nights." Homer's "Iliad," Euclid's "Algebra," the works of Socrates, Cicero, Plato, Herodotus, Thucydides, Xenophon, and many other ancient works were in existence long before we hav any evidence of the Bible being written. The Bible, then, we are told by the pulpit is to be believed and revered because it is the most ancient book, and for the further reason that it has been brought down to us through all these long ages. Why should it not be in existence when there hav been, and still are, immense sums made in publishing it, and millions of men paid for sounding its praises for nearly two thousand years?

Voltaire says, "Fables begin to be current in one generation, are established in the second, become respectable in the third, while in the fourth generation temples are raised in honor of them."

I challenge the preachers to giv reasonable proof of the time the Bible was written; who wrote it, and in whose custody it was from the time it was written until printed. Chambers's Encyclopedia is regarded by all fair men to be standard and reliable authority. In regard to the authenticity of the Bible Chambers has the following: "Bible, a name giving to a collection of sacred writings, recognized by Christians as the book of their religion; Apocrypha is not considered by Protestants as canonical. The Old Testament was written in Hebrew and Chaldaic languages, and originally contained thirty-nine books, but was cut down to twenty-two." What was done with the other seventeen books? They surely could not hav contained any worse or more objectionable stories or language than there is in the twenty-two that were printed. If a part was inspired surely the whole was. It therefore seems wrong to cut down or throw away seventeen books of the inspired word of God. But to continue our quotations from Chambers: "As regards the genuinness and authenticity of the Old Testament, there has been much discussion of late. The generally recorded opinion is that the manuscripts of the books of Moses, Judges, Mordecai, Kings, Chronicles, Job, Samuel, and others, were destroyed by fire when Nebuchadnezzar took Jerusalem, and that Esdras and others rewrote them in forty days by divine inspiration. Tradition mentions Moses as the writer of the Pentateuch. It is generally believed that the law orally delivered by Moses to the elders had before, and after, being committed to writing, undergone innumerable changes and corruptions [inspired word undergoing changes and corruptions], among these the two personal and human conceptions of a God." A man-god, for instance, possessing all the baser attributes of a human being, such as anger, jealousy, vengeance, egotism, and the like. An ancient writer says, "The vulgar belief which imputes to the deity the sentiments of the passions and crimes of man is blasphemous and accursed." Draper says, "The attributes of God cannot be determined by the attributes of man." One of the religious beliefs before Christ was that among others there was one invisible, but not a personal God, to whom it would be not so much blasphemy as absurdity, to impute the form, the sentiments, and passions of man. But to return to Chambers: "At the present rate of investigation the view very generally held is the theory which assumes with certainty two or more authors, only a small school still upholding the integrity and authenticity of the work pronouncing Moses its author. As to repetitions, and contradictions, there is to begin with the very history of creation, which occurs twice in the first chapter of Genesis, and is each time given differently, and in each time the divine name in a different way. The same in regard to the account of the deluge, the account of Moses being the humblest man, his own death, etc. The number of the people, their cattle, and the like, at various periods, do not seem to conform to the laws of natural increase. Multitudes of men are puzzled what to think and what to believe." Owing to these and other contradictions and absurdities throughout the Bible, together with the irreconcilable facts that science is continually developing, the masses hav become indifferent and careless, which is really worse than outspoken Infidelity.

Supposing, then, according to Chambers, that Nebuchadnezzar destroyed the book when he took Jerusalem, it was simply the law of Moses (Chron. ii, 34; xiv, 15). Surely the law of Moses does not comprise the account of creation, biographies of men, accounts of cruel, bloody, and savage wars, miracles, plagues, wanderings of the children of Israel, romance of Joseph, and many other tales and stories.

Chambers does not tell us when these different books were written, and he says merely that it was generally supposed that they were destroyed at the burning of Jerusalem. The Bible says it was only the law of Moses that Hilkiah the priest found. If Nebuchadnezzar destroyed all the copies of the law when he took Jerusalem, they must hav been rewritten afterward, for the Bible says that King Antichus, about five hundred years after, took Jerusalem. He began by putting a stop to sacrifices that were offered up to the God of the Jews. (God's chosen people offering sacrifices to him like heathens to their gods, and a heathen king stopping it.) He polluted the holy temple, profaned the Sabbath, carried off and burnt all the copies of the law he could find, and abolished the ordinances of God. This was in the days of miracles, and yet this Hebrew deity did not lift a hand to save the holy places from being polluted by heathen idolators, and suffered the law he had given to Moses to be destroyed. We are told that soon after the beginning of Christianity the priests had taught the people to believe in miracles, and that this newly adopted Hebrew God (strange that among the multitude of gods that were worshiped before the Christian era the god of the lowest and most degraded people of that time should hav been selected as the Christian God) would protect the temples and churches from profanation and destruction. But when hordes of barbarians and idolators invaded the country, destroying and polluting the churches, and no miraculous hand was interposed to save them, their surprise and astonishment was great, and their ardor and belief in miracles were somewhat abated. Is it not strange that this miracle-working being would allow Infidels to obtain and hold, even unto this day, Jerusalem and the holy sepulcher?

A century or so before Christ, Pompey took Jerusalem, but he did not not touch the treasures that were stored in the temples. Cicero says it was not out of respect for the religion of the Jews that he abstained from plundering the temple, for he had the utmost contempt for this nation and their religion. He caused the walls of Jerusalem to be pulled down. About ten years after this Crassus, another king on a plundering expedition, stopped at Jerusalem and robbed the temple of all its riches, amounting to £1,500,000 sterling. It would seem, at this time, that the god of this nation had entirely abandoned them and the city of Jerusalem. He sent no angels to slay the invaders; no white horses with harness of gold to paw these vandals; nor did he send two beautiful young men to scourge them (see that silly stuff in 2 Maccabees). It seems strange that sensible people do not get disgusted at the many silly and ridiculous stories there are in the Bible. JOHN IRWIN.

Geology and Evolution.

The maximum thickness of the earth's stratified rock is not less than twenty miles. All of it was once sediment deposited in water. Vast areas of it hav undergone metamorphosis, obliterating the stratification and all traces of fossils. The Silurian formation, with a maximum thickness of five miles, was once believed to be the lowest stratified and fossiliferous rock. But it was discovered that the Cambrian rock, nearly two miles thick and underlying the Silurian, is likewise sedimentary and fossiliferous. And now it is found that the Laurentian formation, with a maximum thickness of five or six miles and underlying the Cambrian, is also sedimentary.

Scientists hav confessed their inability to account for the metamorphosis of vast areas of sedimentary rock where there are no intrusions of eruptiv masses forming granit veins. The disturbances of the strata are apparent enough, for it is by upheavals that we know of the existence of the lower formations. And pressure is also recognized as a metamorphic agency. But the prodigious pressure of gravitation together with that of upheaval seems not to hav been duly appreciated. Below a depth of 30 feet the temperature increases at the rate of one degree Fahrenheit for every 50 or 60 feet. "At this rate," says Professor Dana, "the fusing point of iron would be reached at a depth of 28 miles. Accordingly the stratified and fossiliferous rock at a depth of ten miles would be heated up to 1,000° Fahrenheit, or 900 degrees hotter than the material was when deposited ages ago, with all its fauna and flora, which never could endure a temperature much above 100."

Does not this fact refute the Laplace theory of a cooling world? The oldest animals and plants hav, in their fossil state, been growing hotter during all the geological ages, until those which hav not been upheaved are now four or five times hotter than boiling water.

Is not a temperature of 1,000° sufficient to change the character of stratified rock? How much higher was the temperature that produced anthracite coal? And is it necessary to look for the cause of this temperature elsewhere than in the pressure of gravitation, augmented by the upward force of upheaval?

The accretion theory of world formation allows ample time for all the geological changes, and for the evolution of plant and animal life from the simplest and oldest organism up to man. Paradoxically speaking, this vast period is an eternity.

A million years is probably much too small an estimate for the period of man's existence on the earth. It is quite certain that he lived in the Pliocene period, contemporary with the mastodon and other extinct animals. For 500 years mammoth's tusks hav been exported from the Isle of Bones off the mouth of the river Lena in Siberia. The bones and tusks of these and other gigantic animals, resembling the elephant and rhinoceros, hav been discovered since the earliest historic times. But their nature was not understood by the ancients, who believed they were the bones of giants. In modern times the fossil bones hav been collected and reconstructed.

In January, 1613, the bones of a mastodon were found by some workmen in a sand-pit on the river Rhone. A country surgeon named Mazuyer purchased the bones, and gave out that he had himself discovered them in a tomb thirty feet long by fifteen broad, built of bricks, upon which he found the inscription Teutobocchus Rex, a barbarian king who was vanquished near Aquae Sextiae (Aix in Provence) by Marius, who carried him to Rome in a triumphal procession one hundred and two years before Christ. In confirmation of this story Mazuyer reminded the public that, according to the testimony of Roman authors, the head of the Teuton king exceeded in dimensions all the trophies borne upon the lances in the triumph. The skeleton which he exhibited was twenty-five feet long and ten feet broad. It was exhibited in all the cities of France and Germany as the veritable bones of the Teuton king who died some seventeen hundred years before.

But there was an anatomist named Riolan who knew that they were not the bones of a man, but of a gigantic animal like the elephant, and he attempted to prove it, but was met by a physician named Habicott, who maintained that the bones were human. A long controversy ensued between the anatomist and the physician, and doubtless the vast majority, even of the savants of that day, believed that the anatomist was wrong.

Accompanying the exhibition half a hundred medals were displayed which Mazuyer said he found in the tomb of Teutoboccus Rex, bearing the effigy of the Roman general Marius. But Gassendi, a youth of twenty years when the bones were discovered, a correspondent and friend of Galileo and Kepler, and the first disciple of Bacon in France, exposed the fraud of the medals. The inscriptions on them were in Gothic characters. And furthermore we learn from Gassendi that a Jesuit priest, named Jacques Tissot, was the author of the notice published by Mazuyer.

The skeleton of the giant Teuton king remained at Bordeaux until 1632, when it was sent to the Museum of Natural History in Paris, where it is now to be seen, a veritable mastodon of the Miocene period.

In the next period, the Pliocene, we find stone tools. This was at least a million years before Elohim made Adam out of dirt. BURR.

Bruno.

From the Boston Transcript:

From an artist friend now in Rome we hav received a beautiful set of photographs of the Giordano Bruno monument. Religious questions are tabooed in this column, but artistic ones are not; and, as a sort of opposit to the snow-white cross which Jews might kiss and Infidels adore, this magnificent monument at Rome is evidently one which in its artistic aspect even a dévot might dream over. It is always so with works in which sculptors and artists of talent hav wrought under the inspiration of their hearts and not merely for the earning of bread or the gratification of a fancy. They are above dogmas as well as above reason. What is inspiration in art or literature? Why, it is made up of one-half of a sufficient technical ability to prevent artistic blunders, and the other half of a special and passionate enthusiasm in a particular work. Given these conditions, and one may see the inspiration in every line of a completed work. It may be very humble art indeed; it may be something which artists themselvs affect to despise and all the critics ridicule. Frequently even the technical skill shown in a work may be below what would seem to be the lowest reasonable minimum; and yet the man who is himself capable of enthusiasm will see, overspreading it, the evidence of that divine enthusiasm in the artist which is infinitly better than all cold perfection. And how one misses the quality of enthusiasm in certain works of technical masters, to whom beauty is a daily companion and guide, but who in these certain instances hav wrought perfunctorily. Such works are ghosts in a world of life, and they grow more out of place than ever in this generation, which is preëminently not an age of ghosts. It is this very selfsame quality which, in the past, made such wonderful works of beauty of religious paintings and memorials, that is now giving abounding life and meaning to representations of mere flesh and blood reality.

The Bruno monument at Rome is emphatically in this sense a work of inspiration. Evidently the artist was heart and soul in the work; not without the stirring in his own veins of revolt against the obscurantism of authority could he hav put such force and fire into the representations of this "apostle and martyr of Freethought," whose glorified statue now stands in the Field of Flowers, where, nearly three hundred years ago, he was burnt to death. The bronze figure of Bruno, which crowns the monument, represents him in the garb of the Dominican order, of which he was a member, its cowl covering his head, but pushed aside so as fully to reveal the strong face—a face not unlike, in its strength and the prominence of its features, the famous type of Dante and Savonarola and George Eliot, but a little ruder, perhaps, and less ascetic. The nose is long and prominent, the lips firm-set and strong, the eyes deep, penetrating, aflame with thought and resolution. There is about the face the worn aspect which deep and consuming thought, which has no mercy for the body, leaves; the forehead is knitted with the awful inquiry of the philosopher whose thoughts are led on not by subserviency to a system to which they must fit themselvs, but by the awful necessity of truth.

The thinker's hands are crossed firmly before him; the left holds a book, closed except that while the lower edge of the book is pressed against the knees, the forefinger holds the pages at the upper edge slightly apart at a passage which has manifestly led the philosopher into the thought that seizes and commands him. Commands him? Yes; and yet while the whole attitude and look suggests the dominance of the man by the thought, it also suggests dominance on the part of the man by means of the thought; for the determined look upon the strong face says plainly, "This is truth, and according to it I will act, no matter what the consequences may be." A wonderful pose, a wonderful and powerful expression!

Upon the sides of the monument are two bas-reliefs which are scarcely less powerful. The first represents Bruno teaching philosophy at the university of Oxford. Standing in the pulpit of a medieval classroom, attired in the costume of a doctor, Bruno instructs a class of students and of doctors, some of whom are manifestly at issue with him, while others eagerly drink in his words. There are some fine faces in this group, and one of two of theologs who appear ready to leap upon him. Manifestly he is giving them all something to think about. But much more striking is the bas-relief representing Bruno in the presence of, and defying the tribunal of, the Inquisition. In the chief seat of the tribunal—the cross, with skull and cross-bones plentifully emblazoned upon the desk in front of him, and the crucifix above him—is a cowled and gross monk, his clenched hand seeming to point to a kneeling-bench before him. At the side of the chief of the Inquisition stands a bearded secretary, who appears to hav just finished the reading of a decree of condemnation. In the foreground stands Bruno, with head thrown back and fists clenched, too, defiant but without bravado, and very calm. He refuses to bend the knee to the holy tribunal, whose members, ranged along the wall, look at him with astonishment and chagrin. Meanwhile a jailor, supported by soldiers, steps forward with a chain to bind the recalcitrant Freethinker, and to prepare him for the fearful death which he prefers to the bending of his knee.

A marvelously streng work is the whole, and well calculated to affect the popular imagination.

Natural Morality.

Lecture delivered by Capt. R. C. Adams at the Canadian Secular Union Congress.

Morality is the art of right living, and the way in which it can be best attained is the most important question that confronts the Secularist. "By their fruits ye shall know them;" and unless Secular principles conduce to the practice of the highest morality they must stand condemned as false. To be good is to be useful, to practice that which creates happiness. Christians claim that the knowledge of the way to be good is derived from supernatural revelation, and that its rules are to be found in the Bible and in the dicta of the church. But the Rationalist or Secularist declares that morality is the result of human experience as to what is best adapted to secure the welfare and happiness of mankind. All that is good in Christianity is this natural morality. What is essential to Christianity is immoral and injurious. Morality depends upon intelligence, and this is weakened by the habit of mind induced by Christianity, which teaches dependence upon revelation and authority, instead of reliance upon individual reason. The Christian atonement is immoral. It takes the converted murderer to heaven and leaves his victim in hell. Moody says of the penitent thief, "In the morning he was the vilest on earth, in the evening the purest in heaven." He reads a request for prayer "for the conversion of a moral man." Christianity has the proud distinction of being the only religion that damns good men. A candidate for the English Parliament was lately asked for his religious views. "I would like to go to heaven for climate and to hell for society." Christianity is oppressiv. It has kept thousands sweltering in Toronto in the intense heat because it prevents access to the cool waters of the bay and the shady groves of the country on Sunday. It has shut up all libraries, art galleries, and museums on the workingmen's only day of leisure; and these infamous iniquities are perpetrated in the name of the Christian God by men who dishonestly advocate exemption from taxation for all the property connected with this organized oppression. They are not to be blamed individually, for they are only acting in the spirit of the protectiv tariff and national policy, which permits men to suppress able competitors by restrictiv laws; and it is not zeal for God, but a desire to drive men into the churches, that animates the ministers. In olden times good was personified in a God, but men's ideas of good hav altered, while Christianity upholds the old Hebrew God who represents obsolete ideas of good. Natural morality is summed up in the Golden Rule, which was uttered by Confucius five hundred years before Christ, condensed into the word reciprocity; and a sufficient guide for life and a substitute for all the restrictiv codes of laws may be found in the Diamond Rule, "Do no harm." Natural morality demands some changes in the Ten Commandments. It would add one letter to the first and let it read, "Thou shalt hav no other gods before men." It will change the worship of God into the service of man. It will violate the second Commandment and make statues without consultation either with Jehovah or Anthony Comstock. It will abrogate the fourth and make the seventh day a period of true recreation, allowing men to secure such physical and mental refreshment as they desire. It teaches "honor to whom honor is due," and denies that an unworthy parent should be honored by the child. It forbids killing, stealing, lying, or covetousness, but it will abrogate the Christian code of sexual morals. It declares that if people are unhappily married they may remedy their mistake. It repudiates the hopeless doom of Christianity for those who hav erred or blundered, and scouts the false morality that scorns the woman and condones the man, that condemns the woman who sells herself for an hour and commends the woman who sells herself for life. It declares that the Golden Rule and the Diamond Rule are a sufficient guide in sexual conduct. The man who does no harm and who treats a woman as he would hav another man treat his mother, wife, sister, or daughter, will not do wrong, no matter what Moses, Jesus, church, or Mother Grundy say. Natural morality will add new commandments. Some of these are, "Thou shalt giv women equal rights with men;" "Thou shalt giv the laborer the full value of his produce;" "Thou shalt trade freely and tax equally;" "Thou shalt not be stolen from." The Secularist mode of promoting morality is by prevention rather than by preaching. It would secure prosperity first and remove the inducements to wrong-doing that arise from poverty and from the system of business that forces a man into unholy competition to gain a living. It will be the crowning glory of Freethought that it formulated a system that will permit men to liv and practice the Golden Rule. Robert Owen introduced the practice of coöperation, Holyoake established it, Mill, Prudhomme, Lasalle, and Karl Marx expanded it into scientific Socialism, and its modern supporters and leaders are almost entirely in the ranks of Rationalism. The spread of this goodspel of reason is the duty of all Secularists, and in its progress lies the hope of the welfare of mankind. In closing, Captain Adams referred to the decay of Christianity; and his comparison of it to a long-dying shark that he once cut up on the deck of his ship was received with such enthusiasm that it literally brought down the house, some plaster being shaken from the ceiling.—Secular Thought.

DR. J. R. LEEBODY, of Mager College, Londonderry, laments that preaching is declining in efficacy. This he attributes to the fact that the pulpit is not now placed at the same intellectual distance from the pew. In other words, says the London Freethinker, the pew is beginning to find out that the pulpit knows no more than itself.

Personal.

Having substantially recovered from a two weeks' vacation in the wilds of New Hampshire and a subsequent if not consequent two months' stretch of typhoid fever, the Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER is again at his post. It is a pleasure now falling to him to acknowledge the ability with which Mr. W. L Colby has performed the editorial labor so unexpectedly thrust upon him, and to thank the correspondents who contributed so largely to the interest of the paper. His personal thanks are due, and certainly are sincerely given, to his friends Washburn of the Investigator, Watts of Secular Thought, Shaw of the Independent Pulpit, Saladin of the London Agnostic Journal, Foote of the London Freethinker, and to his brother George of the 'Frisco Free hought for their pleasant and flattering words in noting his illness; and the kindest wish he can think of just now is that none of them may ever hav typhoid fever. Correspondents, however, will please be patient, for the Editor is not quite out of the doctor's clutches, and that authoritativ individual does not approve of reading manuscripts as a convalescing recreation. But, slightly changing the words and incidentally the meaning of an alleged person of some notoriety, "Yet a little while and I am with you." E. M. M.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

No doubt our readers are wondering what the significance is of the query scattered through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER last week as to the religious habits of Abraham Lincoln. The explanation is found this week in the opening chapter printed elsewhere of a work by John E. Remsburg, showing that Abraham Lincoln was not a Christian. The appearance of this history is timely, as the clergy are now discussing the parallel statement made in Herndon's "Life of Lincoln," just published by Belford, Clarke & Co. Mr. Herndon, however, devotes but little space to this side of Lincoln's character, while Mr. Remsburg will thoroughly exhaust the subject, and leave no evidence unconsidered. He has at a great cost of time and money and labor collected all the material facts in the case, and prepared them for intelligent presentation to THE TRUTH SEEKER readers. This has involved the purchase and study of all the Lifes of Lincoln, the writing of hundreds of letters, and traveling of hundreds of miles to interview Lincoln's friends. It may well be allowed, therefore, that he has added invaluably to the true understanding of the matter.

Ever since Lincoln's attainment of fame, there has been a controversy on this subject. The church attaches a higher value to the prestige of Lincoln's great name than she would to the conversion of ten thousand obscurer souls. To deny his Christianity is, in her eyes, almost as great an offense as to deny the divinity of Christ. It may be too much to expect that Mr. Remsburg's work will entirely silence this claim, but it will furnish an arsenal of facts with which to refute it as often as made. The rejection of Christianity by George Washington or Paul Jones does not prove it false. But with a majority of mankind the authority of one great name outweighs all the arguments that can be piled up, and this fact cannot be ignored in our work. The evidence of twenty witnesses who support the church's claim will be preserved, and the testimony of the eighty witnesses opposing it that Mr. Remsburg has collected ought to be preserved also.

The evidence pro and con will occupy many pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and require several months for a complete presentation. But this the importance of the work demands, and our readers will find it exceedingly interesting reading, aside from its historical value. Mr. Remsburg never leaves a subject half considered, and this work is unusually thorough even for his all-recording pen.

Bruno.

"EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Will you please favor the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER with a succinct statement of the ecclesiastical offenses for which Giordano Bruno was burnt to death on the 17th of February, 1600?

"Very respectfully, HENRY CROUSE."

Giordano Bruno's troubles with the ecclesiastical authorities began while he was young and performing priestly functions in a monastery at Naples. He was here twice examined and threatened by his superiors for heretical offenses. Once he had set aside the images of the saints and told a fellow-monk that he might be better employed than in reading about the seven joys of the Virgin Mary, and once he had uttered Arian and Unitarian views—that is, denied the incarnation and the trinity, holding that Christ was a man and that God is one. Eight years after his first accusation had been brought against him the ecclesiastical pressure became so threatening that he had to flee to Rome. His persecutors followed him here with their accusation, and he left Italy. He thus began his sixteen years' adventurous journeying about Europe. Geneva, France, England, and Germany were visited and revisited. From nearly every place where he set his foot he was sooner or later driven by ecclesiastics, whom he was sure soon to offend by contradiction. Servetus had recently been burnt in Geneva, and Bruno left in time to escape the same fate. In France the traveler sojourned in various cities, and at Paris was introduced to King Henry III., who was so astonished at his wonderful memory as to inquire whether he did not owe it to magic. Despite the king's friendship, the churchmen succeeded in having him driven away. In England he was allowed to hold a disputation at Oxford University with some learned doctors, in which he seems to hav had an easy victory. In that land he found superstition and pedantry as rampant as elsewhere, and he paints things there in no flattering colors. In these wanderings he supported himself sometimes by teaching youths, sometimes by teaching adults, and sometimes by reading proofs for publishers. Unfortunately, he presently received, while at Frankfort, a letter from a nobleman of Venice, named Mocenigo, entreating him urgently to come and dwell with him as his guide, philosopher, and friend. He longed to see his nativ land, and, yielding, once more was in Italy. He went to Venice, overshadowed as it was by the Inquisition. He was soon identified as the renegade Dominican monk against whom an accusation had been brought years before. Mocenigo became angry with him at a refusal to impart to him some secret of learning, some quick and easy method of becoming a genius, which he supposed the philosopher possessed. By the advice of his confessor, he denounced Bruno to the Inquisition as a heretic, denying the most sacred dogmas of the church—transubstantiation for example. Mocenigo aided with men in the seizure of Bruno at midnight and his transferral to the dungeons of the Inquisition. After remaining here some months, the prisoner was carried to Rome and confined six years in the dungeons of the Roman Inquisition. What he suffered there we hav no means of ascertaining. He was without books or paper or friends. Appearances are, furthermore, that he was repeatedly tortured to break his proud spirit. Perhaps some day, when we hav secured fuller access to the archives of the Vatican, we shall, if the wanted ones are not destroyed, learn more of his years of misery. At length he was brought forth for trial. Among those who formed the tribunal were Cardinal Bellarmin, the same who later on forced Galileo to a recantation, and Cardinal Sanseverina, who had called the massacre of the night of St. Bartholomew "a splendid day, most pleasant to Catholics." With characteristic audacity, he gave his judges a list of his works, and urged the disputed doctrins with the manner of a professor with his pupils rather than that of a prisoner. He was solicited to recant, but refused. Sentence of death by burning alive was finally passed on him in the church of Santa Maria Sopra Minerva. Before the fire was lighted, his tongue was torn with pincers. While he was in the flames a crucifix was held to his face, but he contemptuously turned his head aside. He died unlike many other martyrs, without having uttered a cry.

Such is a brief account of the events of Bruno's life. In person Bruno is described as small of stature, of slight, delicate build; with thin and pallid face, and meditativ physiognomy; the glance both eager and melancholy; the hair and the beard between black and chestnut; in his speech ready, rapid, imaginativ, and of lively gestures; in manner urbane and gentle. Sociable, amiable, and gladsome in conversation, as is the character of southern Italians, he easily yielded to the tastes and habits of others. Of open frankness among friends and foes, he was as quickly moved to anger as he was far from rancor and revenge.

We hav not thus far definitly answered our correspondent's question. To do this we will first glance over the doctrins and opinions held by the philosopher through his life.

First we will speak of his destructiv and Antichristian work. In the whole course of his books and teachings he assailed the church unweariedly. He knew by personal observation the discreditable life of the monks, and he attacked monkhood as guilty of all crimes and all vices. The pope he called "that potentate who is armed with key and sword, with falsehood and force, with hypocrisy and haughtiness; at once Fox and Lion, Vicar of the Prince of Hell, who with superstitious cult and more than bestial ignorance, under the name of divine wisdom, poisons the whole world." One of his works he entitled, "The Expulsion of the Triumphant Beast." The work is an allegory, in which the virtues Truth, Prudence, Wisdom, and Universal Judgment expel the beast of religion. In this book Universal Judgment is the principle whereby men are judged according to their deeds, and not according to their belief in this or that catechism. Mingled with the allegorical philosophy are the most vehement attacks on the established religion. The monks are stigmatized as pedants who would destroy the joy of life on earth; who are avaricious, dissolute, and the breeders of eternal dissensions and squabbles. The mysteries of religion are scoffed at. The biblical records are put on a level with the Greek myths, and miracles are laughed at as magical tricks. Bruno was a lover of nature; his spirit was exuberant and swelling, full of hope and joy, and in another work, De Immenso, he castigates the sour and tyrannous sects that would fain "disfigure the sunniest day with the shadows of hell," and "by their unnatural nonsense stop the even course of the progressiv development of mankind, extinguishing the light of intellect." Through such successivly triumphant sects of zealots, "nation becomes alienated from nation; children desert their parents; men refuse a greeting to those of different faith; every fanatical wight, intellectually impotent as he is, plays the prophet, if he does not even pretend to enact the part of omnipotence." He knew the fate that he bid fair to meet for such expressions, and once prophetically wrote: "Fifty or a hundred torches will not be wanting to me, even though I should walk along in the middle of the day, if ever it should happen that I were to die on Roman Catholic earth." But, he said, he would not be silenced. He wanted to be "an awakener of sleeping minds, a subduer of arrogant stupidity, a champion of the universal love of mankind." To him, he continued, "Italian and Englishman were the same; man or woman, bishop or king, burgher or soldier, made no difference; he only looked at the face of true humanity."

Second we will consider Bruno's constructiv work. We hav glanced at his destructiv courses; we will now see what he aimed to build up in place of that which he tore down, what he affirmed of the universe in place of what he denied. His belief was pantheism, which holds that the universe, all that is, is god. He opposes the notion fostered by Christians that matter is helpless and lifeless. He affirms that it contains in itself all the energies by which it takes its countless varied forms and carries on all the activity that we perceive about us and within us. Bruno conceives the universe as the great Unity, as the Eternally One in which matter and force are identical. Ever changing in its forms and phenomena, it always remains harmoniously the One. In minerals, plants, and animals Bruno recognizes but a varied manifestation of one moving principle. Not even the mightiest power could create the Infinit with its numberless quantity of forms; nor could we imagin something apart from this living immensity. Matter is the primeval basis of everything—matter, from which the operativ force contained in it can never be separated. In it the whole reality exists. In its eternal course Matter pours itself forth by virtue of its inner vitality, through all parts of the whole, and ever returns to itself. Thus he anticipated with the lofty vision of his imagination and genius the conception which the scientists of the present day hav confirmed by their minute experiments and investigations. His words are almost identical with those of the eminent physicist Professor Tyndall, in his Belfast Address: "Matter is not the mere naked empty capacity which philosophers hav pictured her to be, but the universal mother who brings forth all things out of her own womb." Moritz Carriere pronounces the attainment of these conceptions by Bruno to be the most remarkable event in the history of philosophy. Without him, competent authorities believe, the great philosophers Spinoza and Leibnitz would hav done but little of what they did. In addition to this we hav to add a second anticipation of a modern scientific theory. He comes close to that evolution theory which Darwin and Spencer hav expounded in the present day. "Evolutionary maxims," says Karl Blind, "are altogether the special characteristic of Bruno's mind." Had he lived, he might hav developed, proved, and formulated evolution. To his anticipations of these two scientific doctrins, we will add that he gave germs of productiv thought to the two men whom Germany and England reckon their greatest men. These are Goethe in Germany, and Shakspere in England. Many of the loftiest ideas in Goethe are taken from Bruno. Goethe tells how his intellect had been uplifted by the writings of "Jordanus Brunous of Nola." Shakspere's indebtedness to Bruno we will not assert without qualification, similarly to the case of Goethe. However, Professor Davidson and others make out a strong case for it. Bruno lived at the same time with Shakspere, visited England, and was intimate with the poet's bosom companion Sir Philip Sidney. Shakspere's "Hamlet" is full of Bruno's thoughts. The very character of Hamlet is like Bruno. Hamlet lamented that "the times are out of joint" and that he should hav been born to "set them right." Poor Bruno was crushed in trying to set them right. In the year 1600 the tragedy of "Hamlet" was being written in England, while Bruno was enacting the final scene in his real life-tragedy in Italy. The idea in "Hamlet:"

> "Imperious Cæsar, dead and turned to clay, > Might stop a hole to keep the wind away," is the idea of Bruno on the transformations of matter, which he had applied to Alexander the Great.

Third, and finally, we come to Bruno's position on astronomical science. It is known to all that the church had until Bruno's time taught that theory of astronomy which makes this earth the center of all things, the only real world, around which the heavenly bodies revolve. It taught this theory as a religious truth and grounded it upon a large number of passages in the Bible. That Bible, as we know, was written by uninformed Jews. By uninformed men that theory would be the one inevitably accepted. All the testimony would to such men seem to be for such a belief. Consequently they wrote their scriptures in accordance with this belief. The church of course maintained it, as it has every other mistake of the Jews, with curses and tortures. But just before Bruno's time Copernicus had observed the heavens, and declared that the bodies seen there were not lights suspended for the use of God's elect here, but suns with their systems of planets, while our earth was only one of these planets attendant upon these suns, and one of the most insignificant at that. Copernicus was forced to keep silence. The Copernican theory was not allowed expression by any. "But," says Professor White of Cornell University, "the new truth could neither be laughed down nor forced down. Many minds had received it; only one tongue dared utter it. This new warrior was that strange mortal, Giordano Bruno. He was hunted from land to land, until, at last, he turns on his pursuers with fearful invectivs. For this he is imprisoned six years, then burnt alive and his ashes scattered to the winds."

So at last we come to the point of information asked by our subscriber. The ecclesiastical offense for which Bruno was burnt was, teaching an astronomical truth contrary to scripture, the truth that there are other worlds. His early troubles with the church, it is true, consisted in his affirming the oneness of the ruling power and the humanity of Christ, denying the opposed dogmas. And through life, it is true, he had repudiated all theological dogmas. But these counts do not appear prominently in his final accusation. It is true that the accusation reads, "He has written divers things touching religion which are contrary to the faith," but although this would intimate several heretical doctrins, the only one upon which the Inquisitors spent any time was the astronomical doctrin of Copernicus. A few years later Galileo, the successor of Copernicus in astronomical discovery, was ordered to recant the same as Bruno, and, unlike Bruno, he complied. Upon the nature of the charge against Bruno all authorities concur. "In Bruno's work," writes the historian Hallam, "he asserts the infinity of the universe and the plurality of worlds—that the stars are suns shining by their own light—that each has its revolving planets—these were the enormous and capital offenses of Bruno." The Roman Catholic church has lately made feeble endeavors to represent that Bruno was burnt on other charges—as we hav before mentioned. In fact, everyone could know it without its being mentioned. The church's lies and subterfuges in all such cases all are familiar with, and we hav mentioned them only as a point for amusement, and to show the extravagance of her falsehood. We need pay just about as much attention to this pretense as to that pretense which she made when the Bruno revival first began a short time ago. Then she pretended that Bruno was not burnt at all. The documents containing the testimony of eye-witnesses, and many other proofs, were at once sought out, and now she keeps silence on this matter and is turning her efforts toward the manufacture of other falsehoods.

Now we hav given our correspondent what he asked, and more. We hav given an account of Bruno's life; an account of his personal appearance; an account of his teachings Antichristian or destructiv, his teachings positiv or constructiv, and among these latter positiv teachings his special doctrins on astronomy; and an account affirming that these last-mentioned doctrins, the ones on astronomy, were the ones for which he was burnt.

Help the Messrs. Harman and Mr. Walker.

About this time the Harmans and Mr. Walker are getting closer to the vortex of their trouble. October 10th is the day set to begin their trial in the United States district court ostensibly for sending obscene print through the United States mail—thereby probably imperiling the morality of the mail bags—but really for being social and religious heretics, and having the audacity to express their discontent with the existing state of things in Kansas and elsewhere. We do not believe that the Christian people of Valley Falls and vicinity are quite as anxious to preserve the purity of the United States mail bags as they are to drive the defendants in this case out of town and so close up the offices whence issues the heresy complained of. The moving spirits in the prosecution are a banker and the local clergy. The banker's excuse for meddling is that Valley Falls has acquired, because of the presence of the defendants, the reputation of a free love town. The clergy hav entered upon the war against the heretics for the same reason that the clergy everywhere and at all times hav persecuted heretics. Taking advantage of the laws passed at the instance of an organization composed of ecclesiastics and hypocrits, the local monetary and religious influences of Valley Falls are endeavoring to serve God by imprisoning three men whose only crime is publishing protests against the abuse of marital privileges.

It is not pretended that these protests are in themselvs illegal—that is, that everyone who objects to marital brutality in a husband toward his wife is a proper subject for immediate imprisonment—but the authorities, at the instance of the ecclesiastics, claim the language used was obscene. On this, it is only just to the defendants to say that if their language is objectionable to such an extent, a very large portion of the best of the literature of the world must come under the same ban. This was admitted by the judge before whom the demurrer to the indictment was argued.

The question, then, is not really one of obscenity, but the issue is, as Mr. Harman states it, whether the natural and civil right of free speech and free publication shall be sustained; or whether, on the contrary, this birthright of every American shall be tamely surrendered to the encroachments of a politico-ecclesiastical censorship. That is, whether a man has a right to say what he pleases in language no more improper or broad than is used in hundreds of classical books, and in the Bible which the Christians pretend is perfection, or whether when the Christians do not approve of what a man says he shall go to jail. These Christians hav got a law which they will not enforce against themselvs but which they use with great effect against their heretical neighbors, should these neighbors borrow biblical expressions and print them. This law and the method of its enforcement givs the church the position of censor over the literature of the country; and in exercising her power she has fallen foul of the heretical editors of Valley Falls, Kan. A good illustration of the church's methods was seen in the ease with which heretic D. M. Bennett was sent to prison for mailing a pamphlet which the most eminent men in the country declared not obnoxious to the law, while soapboiler Colgate, president of the vice society and Baptist church-member, who violated the law as plainly as language could do, was not even indicted. It was a most infamous case of partiality, but in strict keeping with the character of the Christian church, which has always used the secular power to punish her enemies and secure immunity for crime to her friends.

The two Harmans and Mr. Walker seem prepared for their fate, whatever it may be. Mr. Walker says almost nothing, and Mr. Harman remonstrates with his prosecutors more in sorrow than in anger. Nevertheless their case is a hard one, and all who stand up for justice must sympathize with them, and, when the way is pointed out, do all in their power to aid them. In a week or two we shall know what kind of men they put on juries in Kansas. In the mean time we should judge that letters addressed to the United States District Attorney at Topeka, Kan., remonstrating against this prosecution, would be the best way of aiding the threatened victims of Christian intolerance.

Persecution.

In Forsyth county, Georgia, a man named Conklin has just been convicted for chopping wood on Sunday. The witnesses testified that they saw him chopping saplings just back of his house, but did not know what he was chopping them for. The truth is that he was chopping them for immediate use as firewood. On being questioned one of the witnesses said that he lived near the defendant's house, but had never seen him at work on Sunday before. Mr. Conklin was convicted and fined $25 and costs, amounting in all to $46 80. He is a very poor man. He has been deprived of his hard earnings, and subjected to the odium of being arraigned as a criminal.

Mr. Conklin is a Seventh Day Adventist, and keeps Saturday as the Sabbath. His neighbors deemed it their duty to run his life for him, and so had recourse to the law. The state attorneys took a religious view of the case. They contended that the Adventists were trying to displace the Sabbath of our forefathers and to overthrow the religion of "all past generations."

This and all the similar acts of bigotry continually occurring, show how sunk in the darkness of religious intolerance and ignorance the majority of the world's population yet remains. They show how utterly oblivious nine out of ten of our fellow-citizens are of the principle of individual liberty that the fathers of America proposed. Proposed only—Freethinkers now hav before them the laborious task of giving it embodiment and realization.

Slaves.

Here is another example of that principle of the Catholic church we noted not long ago—its antidemocratic doctrin of blind and unquestioning submissivness to superior officials. The Catholic Standard, of Philadelphia, lays down the law:

> "Priests and bishops are not responsible to public opinion as regards their relations and their respectiv rights and duties. Nor are they responsible to Catholic newspapers nor the readers of Catholic newspapers. Editors, managers, readers of newspapers, all alike hav simply no business with these matters; and for one or all of them to criticise them or attempt to sit in judgment upon them, is simply arrogant, officious intermeddling. For lay Catholics to do this is worse. It is an act of assumption akin to that of sacrilege."

No wonder we find in history before Protestantism arose nothing but groups of brutal despots and slavish, oppressed, yet foot-licking serfs. Human creatures who like sentiments such as these are just the kind of creatures we don't want in this country.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed find $5 to apply on my subscription to your valued paper, which has now become a family necessity.

There are a good many Liberals living on this river, but we hav no organization, though we hav the material for one. I wish you would, in your "Letters from Friends," say to your readers that we would like very much to hav one of your lecturers visit us. I think he would do much good. You can say to any such that would like to spend a short time in this delightful land of sunshine that I shall be happy to receive him at my house, and can guarantee his board and expenses while here at least, and that I hav no doubt but that we can compensate him for a few lectures. We will in any event do all we can, and I am sure any lecturer will be pleased with the trip and improved in health. If any Freethought lecturer will write and notify me, I will make all necessary arrangements in advance for him, and promis a hearty welcome at least. Yours for enlightenment,

MR. EDITOR: Find inclosed $5 for THE TRUTH SEEKER, the best paper I ever read.

I was raised on the toe of a Methodist boot, between heaven and earth. So you see I was raised to fear God and kill chickens when the minister came.

I never read but one side of Christianity till six years ago. I got a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER and that opened my eyes, and I hav found more knowledge or common sense in six years than I did in sixty years out of the Bible.

I am now sixty-seven years old and must hav THE TRUTH SEEKER as long as I liv. I do not keep a file, but send it around where I think it will do the most good.

I liv in an orthodox hell, I mean community. They hate me worse than the devil hates holy water. One-half the people here profess to be Liberals, but they go to church and pay the preacher to keep on the good side of the church-members. Tell Heston to giv us the monkey, tail and all. Superstition dies hard, but I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will liv to preach its funeral. J. R. JOHNSON.

MR. EDITOR: Although strength of logic is not the prevailing characteristic of Rev. Lyman Abbott's "Word With Professor Huxley," in the August North American Review, yet all parties will unhesitatingly admit that it is a prodigy, a masterpiece of manners and gentlemanly breeding, in this theologian to write thus mildly. I don't like it at all. Giv me our old enemies, who were never known to restrain their anger when vindicating the character of Abraham's vicious old God.

Gladstone, Field, Wace, all are preferable to Abbott. Yet if it were possible to induce Brooklyn's lively literary buffoon to tackle Huxley and come out strongly in defense of this burly old dotard (his and Abraham's God), and hold him up as only Talmage can before the wondering gaze of this enlightened age, I think it might hav a tendency not only to keep our filthy old Bibles out of the public schools, but in time to relegate them to the garret, where other cranky Christian books

> Hav lain for ages,
> While moths deform in shapeless tatters
> Their lying pages.

Yea, verily, there is nothing on earth that will so utterly annihilate this scandalous old fossilized myth as its own "wild, untamed" dupes, when a divine frenzy urges them to prove its sanctity. Yours for justice, NELSON HUNT.

PORTSMOUTH, O., Sept. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Ingersoll's lectures complete form a grand volume of heart and brain that should be read by every man, woman, and child in the broad land. Ingersoll is always great, but in these lectures—"The Gods," "The Ghosts," "Some Mistakes of Moses," etc.—he more than gratifies his friends by his vigor and eloquence in his arraignment of the church for its misdoings in the past. No person can thoughtfully and conscientiously read them without feeling that the position taken by the Liberals is in the best interest of all the people of the world. To tell the truth, the Catholic church is dying, and its Protestant children—the Methodists, the Presbyterians, the Episcopalians, etc.—by hard work might sober up long enough to attend their mother's funeral. They can then start in where they left off, on the same old superstitious drunk. The church, as a whole, has a record from away back which deprives it of the genuin jewels of the heart and mind, the crowning thoughts of the world's thinkers and investigators. It is an organization which is artful, which exacts a big fee for a very little work, which schemes to get people by the ears for the purpose of making business for itself; which steals and lies, and destroys the virtues of the human race. The church is mean and tyrannical. It loves to stand over its intellectual slaves with a club, and boss and rob them with vim and vigor. It is as vain as a peacock. It likes to swell, and is delighted when people good-naturedly notice it. They over whom it holds a club, and whom it regards as property, must toe the mark made for them. They must turn neither to the right or the left or reach across the line for a big red apple from the tree of knowledge—good and evil. They must remain motionless, stagnant, as it were, except when commanded to plant their knees in the dust, and pray, "Lead us not into temptation." In short, the church makes of man, of woman, and of child a branded subject in whose mind crouch the hideous fears of hell, and from whose heart is blotted the love to think and reason for one's self. Once within their power you become a kicker, so to speak. You oppose reason, observation, and experience, and accept the unknown, unseen Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. You close the avenues of your mind to splendid truths, and accept the obscurity and the bad of what you name the sacred book as sweet incense from heaven's throne. You become completely changed, and when too late you wish that you were "only a child again just for to-night." The members of the churches, as I said before, are kickers. They may liv again after completing their earthly kicking, may wear a crown, sing psalms, and climb the steeples of New Jerusalem for amusement. All this they may do if there is a future life, but it will be in direct disobedience and opposition to the following lines (author unknown) which consign them without mercy to the "left:"

> Saint Peter, 'tis said, sits out by the gates,
> His hands on the strings of his lyre,
> And he sings, as he sits, a low song as he waits
> For the spirits of those who expire.
> He hears in the distance the chorus of song
> That swells at the foot of the throne,
> And he smiles as the music is wafted along,
> And warbles this lay of his own:
> There's room in this region for millions of souls,
> Who by sorrow and woe were bereft;
> 'Tis for those who hav suffered the melody rolls,
> But the kickers must turn to the left.
> There is room here for people who, when they were young,
> Persisted in sowing wild oats,
> Yet who boomed up the city with sinew and tongue,
> But the kickers must go with the goats.
> There is room for the people who pointed with pride
> To the beauty and growth of their town;
> Who kept singing its praises and charms till they died—
> But the kickers will please amble down.
> There is room for the burghers who cheerfully paid
> Their taxes for sewers and lights,
> But the kicker must stay where the drainage is bad,
> And burnt sulphur illumes the nights.
> There is room for the voters on whose loyal support
> Their party could always rely;
> But the kickers must go to the satanic court,
> A place they can't "bolt" when they die.
>
> There is room for all those who at last and at first
> Supported their tradesmen at home;
> But the kickers who branded home goods as the worst,
> From this mansion forever must roam.
> They'd say that the music was all out of tune,
> And the angelic robes hand-me-downs,
> And they'd send for a jeweler off to the moon
> To sample the gold in their crowns.
> So, while there is room for millions of souls,
> Who by sorrow and woe are bereft,
> We want no complaints of the music that rolls,
> And the kickers will turn to the left.

FORT FAIRFIELD, ME., Sept. 13, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Not having a good clean copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER nor any other interesting reading matter on hand, I took a notion the other Sunday to go out to the Grange Hall (two miles) to hear the new Methodist minister of Caribou hold forth. I sat there an hour or so, and listened to all the nonsensical nonsense of Sunday-school gibberish and clattering of tongues until it closed. Then the said minister not coming, the superintendent (a Methodist minister, too) volunteered his services, and enchained the attention of his audience for perhaps half an hour, during which time he expatiated upon the idea of God making the sun, moon, and stars, and holding them, as it were, in the hollow of his hand, and of his giving his dearly beloved son to cancel the sins of a dying world.

Now, then, Mr. Editor, please allow me to say that my thoughts ran something like this: Suppose, for instance, that the first selectman of Fort Fairfield, one of your radical subscribers, would consent to sacrifice his life to cancel the sins of the population of the town, would that do it? No. Then suppose that President Harrison would consent to sacrifice his life to cancel the sins of our sixty millions of population, would that do it? Most certainly not. How in the name of all that is sensible, then, I ask, can any man who thinks he is by nature endowed with a reasonable amount of brains believe that any God, ancient or modern, I care not which, ever did put a dearly beloved son—an innocent man—to death to cancel all the black sins of the billions of earth's inhabitants who hav lived, do liv, and will liv on the earth while time endures?

With me the idea is too monstrously absurd to cherish for an instant! With me such a being would be an infinit fiend and a black-hearted tyrant and monster not worthy the respect of a town pauper! Worse than the piratical bands that sail the high seas under the black flag, with death's head and cross-bones for a signal, proclaiming war with all nations and victory or death, is the orthodox, Methodist, Calvinistic, Presbyterian God!

During the Methodist camp-meeting here in August two ministers tackled me at the close of one meeting at noon, and I gave them battle, a few minutes each, then came home to my dinner, and went back again in the afternoon for fear they would think they had scared me away. But they did not bother me any more, and my Radical talk to them that noon was reported to my friend at the evening meeting that night.

One of my old Christian neighbors came up here awhile ago and talked with me an hour or so. I also had a spirited talk with a man here yesterday. I had a very loud talk also with a man to-day with whom I was riding. But they all "catch it" in the same way when they tackle me. I pile it to them just as hot and heavy as I know how. By the way, those insane people hav returned to their homes in this town pretty well cured. H. H. GILMAN.

DU BOIS, PA., Sept. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I am the latest subscriber to your valuable paper in this place, and can only say I am sorry I did not start to get it sooner. I am lending it to friends of the cause as soon as we finish reading it. Heston's pictures are one of the best features of the paper, and are as unanswerable as Paine's "Age of Reason." A short time ago a young married man was instantly killed in the mines here. He belonged to two secret societies, who turned out almost to a man to attend his funeral. The rites of those orders, however, were not enough to perform over his remains; his wife had his body taken to the Episcopal church. I sat outside awhile, and finally thought to go in and hear what kind of funeral sermon was preached. I got inside just as the ceremonies were over, and the white-robed relic began his discourse. He said it would be useless for him to say anything regarding the deceased (I suppose this was because he died outside of the church), and as he had a large crowd, he thought it a good chance to giv them some advice, as there might not be such a number there again for some time. He began by saying, Young man, beware of the doctrins of Ingersoll, and then spun a yarn about that intellectual giant, and not one word of sympathy did he giv to that poor woman and her innocent children. I just compared that sermon with the one Colonel Ingersoll delivered over the remains of Horace Seaver, and wondered, When will men and women cease paying money to support such a band of pirates as the Freethinkers hav to contend against? I hav been told by my friends to giv up my Freethought views and pay some black coated robber to think for me, as the Freethinker has an uphill fight. The only answer I can giv to such as those is, that it is better to wear the rags of honest poverty than to wear the purple robes of hypocrisy and deceit. Better to go down to the grave unhonored and unrespected, save by those who honor a man for daring to express his honest thoughts, than to think for one moment of sacrificing nature's choicest gift upon the blood-red altar of bigotry and superstition. I would like to see some good Liberal speaker come here, as the people need the scales knocked from their eyes, and would willingly contribute my share toward defraying the expenses of one. R. R.

GALENA, KAN., Sept. 7, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Let me speak on the text:

> And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not (John i, 5).

The position of the Agnostic to-day is that of one who has climbed to the top of a high mountain at night, waiting patiently until the glorious rays of the coming day shall define clearly each outline of a beautiful landscape. He has surmounted a veritable mountain of superstition, and the pernicious doctrins of the Christian churches are beneath him, and before him stand the beauties of all created life in its glory. His uninterrupted vision will, in the light of truth and reason, see his path through life.

The fallacy of the oft-repeated assertion that such a being has no religion, no hope, either in this life or hereafter, will be easy to explain in a few words, but it shows how incomprehensible his position is to a prejudiced mind. Firstly, we will deal with the charge that he has no religion. What is religion? Webster says "a system of faith and worship." There are not any of the Agnostics who deny the existence of a great creator or God, and the only difference in all forms of belief or unbelief relates to the attributes of this God rather than the existence of a deity. This being granted, it is only as natural that one should hav faith and worship the God of his belief, which will be found to constitute religion. That any person will deny the existence of religion in any portion of an educated community, is a striking exemplification of the truth of the text, "And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not."

We will now deal with the hopes of the Agnostic, and to do this we shall be compelled to contrast him with his Christian fellow-man. This ground has been gone over by abler pens than mine, and little can be added to what has been already written. The Agnostic hopes and strives to make man better in this life irrespectiv of a hereafter. He will be found teaching that doctrin of doing to others as you would be done by, which is by no means confined to the Christian church. The followers of Confucius, Buddha, and Mohammed preach and practice the same thing; with this startling difference—while teaching "God is love, peace and good will toward men," etc., the Christian has shed more blood, and practiced more cruelty, than all the heathen put together. It is not to be supposed for a moment that the Agnostic would reject the Christian, or any other doctrin of a future state, were there anything tangible to found a belief on. The resurrection of the body, the burning brimstone lake on one hand, and the golden city, the harps and golden crowns, as taught by the Bible, are fast falling into disfavor with even the Christians themselvs, therefore an outsider may, in justice, be excused from doubting what even they are not agreed upon.

There are many doctrins besides these which will not stand the strong light of common sense. Any Christian church is vulnerable at all points when judged by this standard. Not essential to goodness, no barrier against evil, generations to come the man of the future will wonder why it existed. Is this the meaning of the text, "And the light shineth in darkness; and the darkness comprehended it not?"

JAMES FORGEY.

LEXINGTON, KY., Sept. 18, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: We hear now, on all sides, that savage races hav a cranial development in advance of what is really their mental condition, proving, as some say, that the creator designs for them a high position in the scale of being in the future. But such vagarists forget that such marks of superiority in whole nations prove that they are remnants of a superb civilization, long passed away, which is sufficiently attested by monument and mound. Such smart ideas would suit the plagiarist, Paley.

National decline is caused by dishonor and vice—any act of which one could not speak to his mother. The "sphere of innocency," as Swedenborg would say, is all that can save our world from mediocrity and ruin. Safely landed in another sphere of motiv and thought, the intuitions of angels will serve us, instead of artificial principles. But the terrible question recurs again, how is society to be dragged upward, with all its crimes and guilt, its selfishness and misery? Pride will never do it. "Love and love only is the loan for love." Open your arms to the loathsome criminal, the beggar, and outcast. The masses cannot always be reached by reason. Talk to them of liberty, and they will die for you. And when the martyr dies how the hilltops blaze with beacon-lights! That is the time for strong motivs, burning thoughts that nerve the arm to deeds of glory. Then private, holy, domestic feelings become public principles, and the multitude are saved. Giv your brother half of your slice, be it bread or cake. "Religion, morality, cannot be one with luxurious living"—the words of a holy man. Your ambition, your style, your combinations, are the rugged brimstone hills where Satan reposes.

There is a way to cause the people to love the Sabbath. How despicable appears an administration distinguished by no grand theories for the good of the people, when cabinet officers keep starving women working all day in close, disgusting rooms, lighted only with a feeble skylight!

Anarchy—this strong, noble nation fattens on it. The people appear wild, because they are forced to govern themselvs the best way they can, without justice, mercy, or hope at the helm. If every day was a Sabbath of love and kindness, we should hear no more of Blair thumbscrews on Sunday.

Father Barry's saintly article for the Eclectic, September, reminds one of a lost land of the blest, in sight once more.

> And are we here,
> Is this our own country?

He speaks of divine poverty, for he knows that the world does not contain food sufficient to feed its inhabitants; that if justice was done, we should all be obliged to liv like anchorites. What hav great men done for us? Richelieu, Laud, and other church dignitaries, employed their talents in devising cruelties on a large scale for their own aggrandizement, apologizing to the people for the same. They engaged in great enterprises to gratify their own ambitious cravings, to confirm the power and stability of the church and government, from which the poor reaped nothing but poverty and misery. Better even poor, pale Garrison, passing through Boston with a rope around his neck.

Archbishop Corrigan next meets us, a forcible writer, but not clear in his elucidations. He intimates that (as we all know) motivs and will arise principally from sentiment or feeling. "But in this respect we are designed as much for heaven as earth. We know not what to will. We are not satisfied even with truth when clearly perceived. The will that is perverted and confused cannot yield to the decisions of reason. We are lost in an ocean of doubt." The church is darker still. In this emergency will Mr. Corrigan show us any good? or shall we cling to reason and the Golden Rule? Has not the church always misunderstood the best motivs of Bruno and the best of men, boycotting them, sending them to purgatory, the Inquisition, or the stake?

From what we hav seen of the effect of Bible teachings, need anyone be surprised if it should cause us to kill our children and ourselvs, having previously set several houses on fire for the glory of God? We know the fearful condition of France from Charles IX. to Louis XVI.—whole districts soaked with blood by religious wars. Still many are slow to admit that "religion" should be expunged from literature, and from the face of the earth. ALHAZA.

LOS ANGELES, CAL., Sept. 5, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: It is demonstrated by Dr. Crafts's own evidence that there is better Sunday observance where there is no Sunday law than where there are Sunday laws. In 1885 Dr. Crafts published his book. This was nearly two years after California abolished her Sunday law, but on page 94 of that book I find: "Both laymen and ministers say that even in California the Sabbath is, on the whole, b tter observed and Christian services better attended than five years ago." Five years goes b ck into the time of the Sunday law, consequently Dr. Crafts, and those who work with him, are working against the best Sunday observance, and to demonstrate this he says he has spent more time lecturing in this state than any six states in the Union. I heard him speak three times Sunday and twice Monday. His principal work was denouncing the American Sentinel and Professor Jones, who had lectured here a few days before Dr. Crafts's arrival. Professor Jones appeared for the Seventh Day people when the bill was brought up last winter, and he informs me that he will be there next winter. He is an excellent speaker and a perfect gentleman, which is something I cannot say for Dr. Crafts, and for sledgehammer logic on the Sunday question he cannot be beaten. October 13th he speaks to the Oregon state Secular Union. I managed to get two articles in two of our city papers on the two days Dr. Crafts was here. One of the articles brought forth from him a circular which he had distributed broadcast, but my point was carried, and the effect was demonstrated by the fact that there was a falling off from an audience of four thousand the first night to twelve hundred the second night.

He had advertised that the Catholics and the workingmen of the city had coöperated with the movement here, and that a leader of the workingmen, also some of the priests, would address the audience. The "workingmen's leader" did speak, but his speech was very short, for the workingmen did not take to what he said and hissed him down before he had fairly got started in his remarks. This put a damper on the meeting and discouraged Dr. Crafts, so that if there were any priests present he did not call upon them. Religious despotism was shown at one of these meetings by the Crafts crowd calling upon the police to suppress the distribution of the American Sentinel in the hall, but before the police arrived everyone had a copy of the paper.

At one of these meetings a resolution was carried to the effect that the postmaster-general be thanked for his actions in stopping Sunday work in some Eastern localities, and that he be urged to close the Los Angeles post-office, as one of the clerks wished to unite with one of the churches but could not, as he had to work on Sundays. In the course of his remarks Dr. Crafts said: "Let the Lord send his angel with a flaming dagger and compel them to observe it as a day of worship." "The Sunday excursion must be suppressed because it takes the slums away from the city into the beautiful country to demoralize the farmer. It is not like the excursions that go out in the country to hold meetings and worship God." Yet he claims the American Sabbath Union is not working for religious legislation. "In the slums of New York," he says, "the workingman will pay $10 for a small room for himself and family, while in the part of the city where I liv he could get three rooms for the same price." If such is the case, what can be Dr. Crafts's social standing in New York? Hav the American Sabbath Union chosen a man from the lowest depths of degradation to advocate their cause? The two leading papers of this city hav denounced the whole thing as a fraud. I wish to say right here that if the next Congress of the American Secular Union does not take some action in this matter, we are going to come out second-best. These pietists hav coöperation, organization, and means, while we hav neither. To win this battle would be the crowning event of this century, but to lose it will be to lose all we hav gained for a hundred years. I think California is safe, and perhaps Oregon and Washington, but what can we three do with the rest of the Union against us? Probably $1,000 expended in tracts, thoroughly distributed, would preserve our Constitution, keep our flag aloft, and nail the fanatic to his cross. Which shall it be—despotism or liberty? FRED. S. LUCE.

FLANDERS, N. J., Sept. 16, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: If the Bible account of creation does not harmonize with scientific research, then the Bible is wrong and science is right. The Bible teaches that all things were made by God in six days, or one hundred and forty-four hours. The first chapter of Genesis is used as an India-rubber machine to stretch into any meaning desired by the human brain. Light was created to divide the light from darkness, but according to this book we had three days and three nights before the creation of the sun, moon, and stars—the source of all light. If we had three days and three nights before these lights were created, why did God create them "to divide the day from the night," which he had already done on the first day? The writer got mixed in his knowledge, which proves his ignorance and shows he was not God, for he, being the author of all natural and scientific laws, would not make such a blunder. We had, according to this book, vegetation growing before the creation of the sun, moon, and stars, which was impossible. Then this book treats of the construction of creation as though the earth was flat, and above us a solid firmament with windows, a matter which every schoolboy ten years old knows is not so. The theological world long held that the creation occurred about six thousand years ago, but science, God's infallible law, so thoroughly demonstrates the fallacy of this belief that theologians hav been forced to abandon their former teachings. Many of our fixed stars are so far distant from us that light traveling from them to us required millions of years. The Mississippi river has occupied its present bed at least one hundred thousand years, according to geological research. The Niagara Falls produce evidence of having been wearing away the rocks for at least one hundred thousand years. Relics hav been found below the fourth forest level, making the earth not less than fifty thousand years old. Exhumed relics of the human race and ancient civilization in the valley of the Nile prove a period long before the Genesaical record in the Bible. Trees are still in existence more than twenty thousand years old. The stars, rocks, mountains, rivers, and forests attest the creation of earth long before our written records begin.

When God completed his work of creation he is said to hav pronounced it "very good." But according to this book man was destitute of knowledge of good and evil, and through his ignorance he disobeyed God and became debased, which he could not avoid, because he knew no better, and God knew he would when he created him and told him not to eat of the forbidden fruit. Then, lest he eat again and liv forever, he was driven out of Eden, and God repented of his imperfect works. "He rested on the seventh day," as though he got tired.

The story of the creation of man and woman shows that the writer did not understand the physiological law of generation, or else he purposely meant to deceive the race, probably the latter. Man soon became so corrupted that God determined to drown the whole earth, covering the tops of the highest mountains twenty-seven feet with water, and for forty days he held the windows of heaven open and poured out a quantity of water more than eight times the size of the earth, causing it to rain from four to six hundred feet of water per day. The whole flood story is unscientific, and the ark was altogether too small for the number of animals said to hav been saved. It was too poorly ventilated to accommodate what was in it. It would hav required one hundred such vessels. And then the idea of Noah keeping such a building clean and carrying all the filth forty-five feet high and casting it out of that little breathing-hole!

We are further told that God gave man every tree and herb bearing seed or fruit for meat, but science demonstrates that many are deadly poisons. "The voice of God walking in the garden in the cool of the day," is a foolish and ignorant expression. Here we first learn of woman's inferiority to man, but facts demonstrate that in many things she is his equal and in some his superior. God created just such a race and earth as pleased him, then "cursed the race and the ground for their sake."

If God is a personal being without respect of persons, will some theologian inform us why he accepted Abel's sacrifice instead of Cain's, knowing that it would result in murder? Was the slaughter of innocent beasts any better than the fruit of the ground? To admit it is to say that God is a bloodthirsty being.

Lamach, Noah's father, is the first recorded man having two wives, and he was a murderer, and his son, we are told, "walked with God." And because of his uprightness God saw fit to save him and his family when he drowned the world. Yet Noah was a drunkard—and established slavery by cursing his son, which is defended throughout the whole book, and has been upheld by the church until Abraham Lincoln repealed God's law and abolished slavery here in America.

We are told that God made a covenant with Noah not to drown the world, and superstitious religious bigots still believe that is the reason we hav a rainbow, while the fact is that it is and always has been caused by the sun shining on drops of falling water, reflected to the eye of the beholder from where he stands.

The town that was built after the flood, destined to reach into heaven, only proves the ignorance of the early race respecting the construction of earth and the expanse above and around us. We are told that the "Lord came down to see it, confounded their language," and thus stopped their work.

When Abraham went into Egypt he got his wife to lie to the Egyptians, denying she was his wife, and pretending to be his sister. Then, during the war between the kings this saintly man armed his three hundred and eighteen trained servants that were born in his own house. But as he was childless, and God promised him his seed should be as numerous as the stars, he began by raising children from Hagar, a concubine, so Ishmael was the first illegitimate child on record. And fourteen years after that event Isaac was born, by his wife, and yet when God directs him to offer a human sacrifice he says, "Take thy only son Isaac," which was not his only son. Then Abraham entertained three angels, killed for them a calf, and set before them butter and milk, so that in those days angels must hav been flesh and blood in order to eat such material food as that meal was composed of.

If the account be true of Abraham pleading with the Lord to save Sodom, it only shows how God could be persuaded to change his mind and save that just man, Lot, who offered his daughters to the people to ravish. Then he got intoxicated and committed incest with both of his daughters, and from them sprang two nations. If it rained fire and brimstone out of heaven upon Sodom, it looks as though the fires of hell, so much talked about, must be in heaven. Abraham had his second wife, and we are told that he gave all that he had to Isaac. Then the narrativ says he gave gifts unto the sons of his concubines.

The story of Esau and Jacob, and how Jacob, with his mother's intrigue, managed to deceive poor old blind Isaac, and cheat Esau, is one of the most unholy pieces of theft and dishonesty that persons can be guilty of, yet God rewarded Jacob and made him a great man, while his sons were leading a lustful life with their father's concubines.

God never inspired much of this book, for he is not a God to lie, deceive, commit all sorts of crime, or giv countenance to them as is here represented. That Moses did not write this book is evident. It probably falls under the record in 1 Kings xxii, 23: "The Lord hath put a lying spirit in the mouth of all these prophets."

Of course genesis means creation, and we should expect that this book Genesis would deal with creation, but if there is a higher power than man, as there undoubtedly is, all creation was the result of scientific law going through regular gradations of advancement, and all to correspond with that same law which is unchangeable. Therefore, to impute this book to inspiration and say Moses wrote it as he was directed by an allwise God, is simply to affirm that God directed many foolish and unscientific accounts. Theologians hav long held to the letter of the Bible, but when science demonstrated their errors they began to seek for a plan by which they could bridge over their errors. But they hav made a miserable failure.

To impute to God such stories of Noah as we find in Gen. ix, 20-26; the story of Abraham and Sarai, xvi, 1-12; the law of circumcision, xvii, 9-14; the story of the Sodomites, xix, 1-6; the story of Lot and his daughters, xix, 30-36; the story of Rachel and Bilhah, xxx, 1-10; the story of Leah and Zilpah, xxx, 9, 10; the story of Leah and Rachel, xxx, 14-17; the story of Rachel, xxx, 22-24; the story of Jacob and his flocks, xxx, 25-39; the story of Rachel and her father's images, xxxi, 19-35; the story of Dinah, xxxiv, 1-29; the story of Reuben and Bilhah, xxxv, 22; the story of Judah and Onan and Tamar, xxxviii, 6-30, and the story of Joseph and his master's wife, xxxix, 1-20, is to hav a very poor opinion of God's morality. He, as God, would not mix up with such wickedness and iniquity. To charge upon God that he ever gave his entire approval of everything he had made, in Gen. i, 31, and then in Gen. vi, 6, showed dissatisfaction with his own works, is charging him with being a changeable God, which he declares he is not. We hav too great a respect for our creator to charge such foul, contradictory writings upon an infinit God.

The Cat and the Sparrow.

WHY CATS WASH THEIR FACES AFTER EATING.

The old cat, one fine day,
Caught a sparrow so gay,
Thinking to make her his meat;
Said the bird to the cat:
"Though you may call it flat,
Without washing his face does no gentleman eat."

Said the cat: "That is so,
Like a gent I will do."
While catship was washing his face,
Mistress Sparrow left free,
Would not then eaten be,
But flew far away from the place.

Then declared the fooled cat,
"I was confounded flat,
For that dudish wash I was worst,
Though I want to be neat,
I will not miss my meat,
I'll wash my face last and eat first."

Pleasure and Science.

It was the month of May when the young students of natural philosophy, accompanied by their father, departed from their home for a several days' trip, to visit their aged but nevertheless vigorous grandparents, their uncles, aunts, and cousins. They not only made a pleasure trip, but a trip from which they derived untold benefit in the way of illustrations, explanations, and laws of natural philosophy, their most desired study.

They chose a route which they had never previously traveled, and although being extremely rough and hilly, it afforded many little, interesting scenes.

The first of these was a pond adjacent to the roadside, in which a flock of geese were swimming and cleaning their already clean feathers.

The green trees, grass, flowers, and sparkling water in which the white geese glided, with their waving motion, composed a very picturesque scene. The girls wondered why they could continue swimming, and as it was their intention to inquire and fully satisfy themselvs concerning the cause and effect of all philosophical mysteries, the father explained to them that it was according to one of the three laws of motion. Action is equal to reaction, and in an opposit direction; thus the geese in swimming force the water back of them, and the elastic as well as the buoyant—that is, upward—pressure of the water causes it to react and spring back, and by the geese continuing, unconscious to the law of nature, they remain swimming upon the surface. Several kinds of birds, such as ducks, geese, and swans, swim easily on water. They owe this property to a thick coating of a light impervious down, which covers the lower part of the body so that they displace even with a small immersion a weight equal to their own.

He also explained why the sawdust collected in masses on the same pond. He said that there are two forces, cohesion and adhesion; that the former is the force which unites two molecules of the same nature; for example, two molecules of water; and that the latter holds together molecules of different nature; for example, one molecule of water and one of iron.

"The force of cohesion," he said, "is illustrated by the sawdust collecting on the water; one molecule always attracts another until they are all attracted and held together by the force of cohesion."

The girls were greatly interested in this explanation, so a new question "turned up" in the way of a house that had double windows. One of the girls insisted that it was to prevent the cold from coming in, and it was long before she could be convinced otherwise. Her father told her they were double for the purpose of keeping in the heat.

They refreshed and invigorated their minds by singing a song, and when they concluded they were at the bottom of a hill, when lo! to their astonishment, on a rail fence that inclosed the wood to their left sat a trio of large, rosy, healthy daughters of the wilderness. One trio was as shy and surprised as the other.

Directly in front of the travelers was a hill so rough and high that the road appeared to end before them, and Nellie, the horse, stopped to rest—which she generally did at sight of a hill—before undertaking the ascent. The father then inquired of the trio "if that was the end of the world." Then each, partly on account of their sudden surprisal, and partly on account of the absurdity of the question, gave a giggle in succession, which nearly caused the rail to slip upon which they were seated. After this introduction one answered: "I think not." He then inquired as to the whereabouts of a certain family. After they had informed him he induced Nellie to climb the hill. They wondered how those girls could hav discoverd that most secluded and desolate-looking place with no houses in view for two miles around.

Well, they saw curiosities at their grandparents' too numerous to mention, besides enjoying a decidedly good visit. On the way the father would stop Nellie and talk politics about an hour at a time with men that met them, much to the disgust of the girls, until at last Nell considered it her duty to stop whenever any person or child met them so that they would discuss pol tics long enough to giv her a sufficient rest, but greatly tiring the girls, who declared it mere laziness on her part. It was ridiculous in her, stopping where it was not necessary, before people with whom they were not acquainted, so their song of miles was composed of more rests than notes.

They passed many beautiful streams and springs, which their father said were due to the tendency of water to seek its level, for gravity causes water to flow from higher to lower places.

He said: "This is better illustrated by the Artesian wells where the water tends to rise higher than the ground, because the spring which feeds the well comes from a higher place than where the well is sunk. They are so named because they hav been used in the province of Artois (Latin, Artesium), France. They were also early employed by the Chinese for the purpose of procuring gas and salt water."

There is much to learn concerning the wells. He furthermore stated that water has great force and pressure, and comically illustrated this truth by telling Herschel's amusing story of the man who attempted to walk on water by means of bulky cork boots, who had, however, not ventured out far ere the law of gravitation seized him, and all that was visible of him was a pair of heels whose movements manifested a great state of uneasiness in the human appendage below.

Meanwhile they bethought themselvs of another question, so after some thought they inquired: "Why is it so difficult to walk in this miry clay?"

He replied: "Because the upward pressure is removed from our feet."

He assured them they could try it for themselvs—take a tumbler containing water, then lay a sheet of paper over the top, then quickly invert the tumbler and the upward pressure of the air will support the water.

"All this," he said, "comes under that part of philosophy known as pneumatics, which treats of the general properties and pressures of gases. The barometer is the instrument for measuring the pressure of air. It consists essentially of a tube and cup of mercury. It is said that the first barometer was filled with water. The inventor, Otto Von Guerick, erected a tall tube reaching from the cistern in the cellar up through the roof of his house. A wooden image was placed within the tube floating upon the water. In fine weather this odd weather prophet would rise above the housetop and peep out upon the queer old gables of that ancient city, Magdeburg, while in bad weather he would retire to the protection of the garret. The accuracy of the movements attracted the attention of the neighbors. Finally, becoming suspicious of Otto's piety, they accused him of being in league with the devil. So the wronged philosopher relieved his wicked wooden man from longer dancing attendance upon the weather, and the staid old city was once more at peace.

"That was the way in which all philosophical ideas and experiments were suppressed by the shallow-minded and superstitious people, while, if they had endeavored to aid him, he would probably hav succeeded better in making the world wiser." They were now nearing home, returning by a road commonly known as the "devil's elbow," the roughest road they had ever traveled. Despite its barrenness and declivity it commanded a decidedly good view of their neat little town in the distance, and the surrounding lowlands where everything was green and fresh. It was Decoration day and a crowd of people had collected in the cemetery for the purpose of decorating the graves of the unforgotten heroes.

Although the sun was shining, it was raining, and there was a beautiful rainbow, in which one could plainly discern the secondary bow. At a distance from their elevation it appeared as if the people were collected under the rainbow listening to the music of the band and waiting for the rain to cease, perhaps unconscious of the existence of the bow. It was the most beautiful sight they ever beheld.

Their father then described the cause of the rainbow as far as possible without drawing a diagram. He said: "The rainbow is caused by the refraction and reflection of the sunbeam in drops of falling water, therefore a rainbow is always seen opposit the sun. The white light is thus decomposed into its simple colors, viz., violet, indigo, blue, green, yellow, orange, and red. The inner arch is termed the primary, and the outer or fainter arch is termed the secondary. The appearance and extent of the rainbow depends upon the position of the observer and the hight of the sun above the horizon. The nearer the sun is to the horizon the larger is the visible part of the bow. But, as the sun rises, the arch diminishes, and entirely disappears when the sun is forty-two degrees above the horizon. Hence, the rainbow is never visible except in the morning and evening. The rainbow has not been sent by any supreme power, but is one of nature's beautiful works."

Meanwhile they had reached their homes and were welcomed by faces rendered happy at their return, and so their home-coming was as pleasant as their departure.

Correspondence.

SPRINGFIELD, MASS., Sept. 23, 1889.

MISTRESS OF THE CHILDREN'S CORNER: Your sketch of Horace Seaver was, as its subject deserved, the best work of the kind you hav penned. The blackmailers of the dead will hav hard work to besmirch his name. They can't call him a sot, a roué, an Anarchist, or any of the nameable or unnameable evil things they might like to, for they know such lies would not go down. They may not say he recanted and died calling on God, or that he went to hell cursing, for his last words are on record. I wish every child might hav his photograph for his next birthday present. The few copies of his investigator which I saw when a boy helped me much in repelling a Baptist hell. Washburn's "Extracts from Seaver" is a better bible one hundred times than is the old Jew book. JOHN P. GUILD.

VERSAILLES, IND., Sept. 15, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: I send you a production for the Children's Corner which I think, if you publish, will afford some knowledge as well as interest to my friends of the Corner. If it is too long, you can publish part one week and part the next—that is, if you think it suitable.

School will begin to-morrow, and then my time will be somewhat limited for essay writing and such. I will take the high school course and intend to learn all I possibly can. I graduated last spring, and being the best speaker, consequently I had to represent our township in the oratorical contest of the graduates at the Teachers' Institute. I will send my speech for the Corner in the future if you hav no objections.

I will recount a part of a lecture delivered at the Institute by a professor. It was on the subject of education, but the lecturer branched off and said, "Socrates and Plato were great philosophers, yet they were deficient in that one particular—morality. They never used the Bible as their book of morality—they did not even teach morality." They did, but not according to the Bible as their standard. They did not even tolerate the Bible, which shows they had a greater sense of morality than their accusers can boast of having. To think that an educational person can meaningly recommend such a book as the Bible! He said much more on the same subject, but it is too foolish to speak of, and would occupy too much of our precious space, which I think is already too much taken up by this letter, so I will now close. Wishing the children would send more letters to the Corner, and wishing success to the Corner and yourself, I remain, Yours respectfully, EMMA STOCKINGER.

FOR
Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world Price 25 cents.

Poetry.

An Agnostic Aspiration.

No, not for me the selfish prayer:
"Lord, bless thou mine and me;
Protect me by thy watchful care,
Keep me from evils free!

"Prolong my days, keep Death afar,
Thine angel though he be,
But when he calls, in some bright star
Eternally bless me!"

Lo, what am I, that I should be
Above my fellows blest?
That God should from them single me,
Save me—and damn the rest?

Am I to taste eternal joy
While friends I love are lost?
Shall songs of praise my harp employ,
And they in torment tossed?

Shall I find joy in heaven's bliss,
In peace one moment dwell,
While lips I loved on earth to kiss
Are parched with fires of hell?

Will heaven giv happiness and peace
If songs of paradise
Awaken echoes ne'er to cease—
Hell's agonizing cries?

Perish the dastardly desire,
The self-concentered thought,
Content to escape the heavenly ire,
However escape be bought.

No, let us share our common fate;
Strive not for Self, but All.
It is not love, 'tis naught but hate
That careless sees a brother fall,

I seek the joy of all mankind,
The universal rest;
The bliss supreme let all men find,
All equally be blest.

If man the whole wide world around
Be brother-kin of mine,
For him as well let bliss abound,
Love's sun eternal shine.

—Samuel J. Macdonald in Twentieth Century.

Only Part of the Sermon.

'Twas just a week ago to-day
I sat in a soft-cushioned pew;
Sore is my need to watch and pray.
But I dreamed the solemn sermon through.
And—be not shocked at what I say—
I fear, my love, I dreamed of you!
I heard in a disconnected way
What the good preacher said, 'tis true;
But slight heed wandering senses pay.
That fell these words was all I knew;
"Thy lips—are like—a thread of scarlet—
Thy lips—drop as—the honeycomb—
The smell of—thy garments—is—like—
The smell—of Lebanon."

'Twas Solomon's Song the preacher read;
To many grave things he referred;
(There came from outside, overhead,
The twitter of a little bird;
The soft breeze grateful coolness shed;
But scarce its gentle impulse stirred
A prayer-book's leaves.) The sermon led
From "first" to "second" and to "third,"
And still I dreamed. Of all was said
These words alone I faintly heard:
"Thy lips—are like—a thread—of scarlet—
Thy lips—drop as—the honeycomb—
The smell of—thy garments—is—like—
The smell—of Lebanon."

Sweetheart, I thought of you he spoke!
I thought he spoke of you, and well;
The flower-sweet fancy nothing broke,
There came no change, no asphodel;
And was I wicked? Who shall croak,
Who my evil-doings tell?
"Love one another" is the yoke
That we must lightly bear. The spell
Staid with me after I awoke.
After the benediction fell:
"Thy lips—are like—a thread—of scarlet—
Thy lips—drop as—the honeycomb—
The smell of—thy garments—is—like—
The smell—of Lebanon."

Obituary.

DIED.—Sunday, July 28, 1889, Miss Emma Reints, aged 21 years, at the residence of her father, Mr. Henry Reints, near Foreston, Ill.

Notwithstanding THE TRUTH SEEKER furnishes this family with gospel reading, her funeral was attended by several hundred friends from the town and surrounding country.

The services were conducted by Prof. James Milleson, of the Chicago Secular Union, who delivered an appropriate but Liberal oration at the house, and pronounced a Rational benediction at the grave, rivaling the solemnity of orthodoxy on similar occasions. He found no truthful scientific reasons for believing that her future slumbers should any more be disturbed by unpleasant dreams than were those of a similar eternity which preceded her few moments' conscious existence. It is more encouraging to know that all may sleep than to believe in the eternal suffering of one human soul.

By an oversight the above obituary has been delayed in publication.

DIED.—At Meriden, Conn., James H. Huggins, aged 75 years.

The deceased was an old-time Freethinker. He kept a news department at which he sold THE TRUTH SEEKER. At the grave Mr. L. L. Sawyer, his friend, spoke as follows:

James H. Huggins was a superior man, above the mediocre in intelligence, tender, affectionate, honest by nature, and one of the old "landmarks." He was a boy all through life, even into old age.

He did not regard the laying up of money as the chief object in life, but rather he looked upon it as a convenient means of enabling him to enjoy with family and friends the pleasures of this world. He realized that all property he might acquire more than sufficient to support him and those depending on him, besides giving comfort and enjoyment, was to be left behind him when he departed this life.

He did not think that man was created to be a saint in this world, but that good conduct, good works, and an honest existence constituted man's mission upon earth. Nor was he superstitious. Religious rites and ceremonies he respected the same as the opinions of others upon all questions wherein he might hold different views. In some respects he enjoyed religious services, especially the sacred music; but still he regarded religion as an individual relation with his creator. Heaven to him was a condition, not any particular place; but such a condition that, if enjoyed at all, the enjoyment was to be in this world. To use his own words just before his death: "If good enough, I would be a Universalist."

He lived for this world. With him it was one world at a time. When in another he would liv the best he knew how. This is but justice to him whose life has ebbed away. We should not dare to wrong the living or misjudge the dead.

He had his seasons, O Death! From the spring of youth to the winter of age he lived, and garnered into his storehouse joy, contentment, and pleasure, from which in later days he drew much happiness. When his evening came his sun did not set behind dark, dreary clouds of gloom and fear, but in resplendent rays of peace, confidence, and trust. The messenger of day lit his pathway into the haven of rest. Then it was he closed his eyes in mortal sleep to awake in the morn of his immortality in that realm beyond where multitudes hav gone before; where there is no more mystery, for which he had no fear.

So he lived, serving his time and generation well, and, like the sturdy old oak, he had to yield at last. Farewell!

The sleepless nights—the tears—mistake him not as husband, father, friend. A tender heart, a steadfast friend, an honest man has gone. But yesterday alive, enjoying this beautiful world; to-day the silent clay, the cold, upturned face, the grave. And where is he?

We are sad in the deep contemplation and presence of death. Those eyes are closed in everlasting sleep; those ears deaf to all sounds of time; the tongue is as silent and voiceless as eternity. We are dazed in the glimmering light of eternity. Yet we too must be launched upon the unknown sea. Such is life, death, and mystery. All is mystery.

Old friend, your heart-strings of this life are broken, while mine are strained. Yes, I am weak where I would be strong. You were my friend and I was yours. With all thy faults and mine, we were ever true. Above your silent form and at your grave, as you so requested, and I desired, I now keep my word and pay this tribute to your worth, my loved old friend.

Fare thee well, and if forever,
Still, forever, fare thee well.

"Jesus Paid—Go Ahead."

What a fuss to get four barbarian Irish Catholics into heaven, while their victims are in hell, and no sympathy expressed at their horrid fate by their converted murderers, these holy priests, and the whole Christian blood-washed crew! (See THE TRUTH SEEKER, first-page illustration and editorial, September 14th.)

"It is a greater crime to reject our Lord and savior Jesus Christ than to kill one's mother," is reported as the saying of a reverend Christian fanatic.

Yes, to "eat meat Friday," the morning of the execution, would hav been a greater offense than murder, and hav forever debarred these monsters from heaven.

Observe the cant in all these newspaper reports: "The good priests;" "the faithful priests;" "pious ministrations;" "divine forgivness;" "the scene was an impressiv one," etc.

How careful to avoid calling them criminals! "Condemned men;" "unfortunate man"—Carolin! "Unfortunate," as if some villain had injured him, instead of his having killed the woman who had afforded him sensual pleasure! "The promis of a consecrated grave seemed to giv the unfortunate man great satisfaction." Yes; he cared more for consecrated ground for his own vile carcass than for the hellish crime he had committed, the death and eternal burning of the woman he had pretended to love—to such unnatural depravity does the Christian religion doom its unjust, cruel, and fanatical devotees.

"Go bravely to the gallows, having made his peace with God" (Packenham). Not so; he had made his peace with the priests, and they had lulled his conscience to rest with their canting hypocrisies, mock ceremonies, and artful assurances. "My son, bear up under this trial." "Hav no fears, father." Glory was just in view—female angels, Abraham's bosom, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, harp, crown, etc. Could teachings be more dangerous and untrue?

"A crucifix was the one thing the candle-light made conspicuous"—and the only one thing needful to enable them to die peacefully and become canonized saints.

"Sad procession!" Why sad? Were not these men to bask in eternal felicity while their victims were everlastingly wailing in torment?

Don't call them "wretched." They were full of joy, and anticipating unspeakable glory throughout the endless ages of eternity.

But why multiply comments when Heston and the editorial pen hav so graphically done their work?

Pardon me, Mr. Editor. I wanted to fix the attention on three important points: The willingness of the press to aid in prostituting the public mind in favor of the worst religion extant; the ruinous consequences of such sacrilegious sophistries, seemingly so sincerely expressed; and, above all, the work necessary to counteract these ingrained falsities and establish simple honesty instead on the only true foundation of pure scientific Rationalism. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Barre, Mass., Sept. 14, 1889.

PERPETUAL PROGRESS.

No age
Hath e'er possessed its own ideal heritage,
Nor fully won the thing for which it fought.
The high-souled wars each one doth wage
Develop means beyond the end it sought,
Create the large sphere another age will fill
And pass beyond, until the noble plan,
For which men toiled and wrought,
Is lost within the broader span
That ages hold in trust for man.
Our paths are up an endless hill
Whose steeps are ever higher than the last,
Where hope doth mount and fear doth stay—
To day's attainment was the dream of yesterday
And so will be to-morrow's past.
A change draws on—here ends our common way,
And merges into duty's rugged path
Which breathes a sterner beauty aye than hath Adorned the May-born years we leave to-day
To seek the aftermath.
Laws of progress bind the race,
Change is mighty, thought is king,
Stalwart minds lead on apace
Seeking right and following
Beyond the daylight's outer ring.
For him who manfully doth cope
With wrongs and hydra-headed ills,
Who faithfully his part fulfils,
The coming years are big with hope,
And when his sun goes westering o'er the twilight hills,
Life's sweetest joys will wait him on the evening slope.

—Thomas Walter Buchanan, of Albany, N. Y.

This is called an age of progression. I do not know of any time that was not grand and eventful. And even though there be changes that are immediately for the worse, are they not movements toward other transformations to a higher phase of being? Is not the whole eternally the same? What is progress but transmutation?

A CLERGYMAN WITH A CONSCIENCE.

The most curious contribution to the United States conscience fund comes from the Rev. A. Cuddy, formerly chaplain of the legislativ assembly of Arizona territory. He has sent $25.50, being part of his salary paid him for offering prayers to the legislature.

His motiv for this action, as explained by him, is as follows: "I cannot see that it is right for the rulers to take the people's money and pay it out to some hypocrit to stand up before a legislativ body and pray for pay." He also states that he once acted as clerk of the legislature, and received for his services $640, but while performing this duty he was also employed in whisky-selling. He thinks that he should return the $640, and would do so, he says, but for the fact that he has not got it. Mr. Cuddy resides at Phœnix, Ariz.—Newspaper.

The prevailing pious idea is that the earth is the Lord's and the fullness thereof, and whatever his praying ones may want they hav a right to as his favorits and it matters not by what method they get it. That is the way Jesus sent for the ass to ride, and the people hav allowed themselvs to be ridden by all pretenders who hav cared to Jew them ever since. A minister who has reformed enough to relinquish an unearned salary ought to be substantially monumented.

DESPICABLE POSITION OF DAILY PAPERS.

Does Herr Seidl really believe the deluge a myth?—New York Herald.

Does the Herald really believe that the deluge is a fact?—Philadelphia Record.

Is it not time the progressiv newspaper ceased paying respect to the dead myths of the past? And yet, with all the flippancy with which ark stories and fish stories are treated in the press, that public tribune contributes a large share to the respect maintained toward the church and clergy whose capital is these same played-out miracles.

ACTUAL ATHEISM.

Ernest Renan, the arch-Infidel, says in his latest book, that the most logical attitude of the thinker in the presence of ideas of God and immortality, is to act as if they were true. Certainly this is very prudent advice, but if Renan cannot advance anything more radical than this as the final result of Atheism, then it is about time that the Atheist shut up shop.—The Springfield Messenger, Catholic.

Because Renan's ideas of God and Christianity are different from those of the church is sufficient reason that he is called an Infidel, and as he has no small following he is entitled "arch-Infidel." He was always more of a poet than critic, and logic is his weak point. When the ideas of God are contradictory how will he act in their presence as if they were true? What can he do now if immortality were true, more than he can do if it were not? If Atheism could offer nothing better than Renan it indeed might as well shut up shop, but such is not the teaching of Atheism. Renan never posed as an Atheist, and in the presence of the representation that such negativ men are Atheists it is time that positiv Atheists come to the front and show their colors. We cannot afford to be interpreted by others without making ourselvs explicit.

ROMAN CATHOLICS TRYING TO CRIB THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

John Boyle O'Reilly materially added to his literary reputation by his poem on the "Pilgrim Fathers." There is a highness of aim through it all and the ending and beginning deserve the same treatment that was given to Derzhavin's poem on "God," namely, to be written on silk in letters of gold, and to be hung not as were the Russian's verses, in the palace of the Chinese king, but in the American palace, the Capitol.—Catholic Messenger.

What love has the Roman Catholic for the Pilgrim fathers? Had they come under the power of that church they would hav been roasted instead of allowed to go off to starve, freeze, or be entertained by the more tender savages. And Derzhaven's poem on "God," bah! Was there ever a more dead giv-away on God than that same belauded string of words which sublimate in the audacious Agnosticism of the last line:

Being whom we call God and know no more.

THE VATICAN MANUSCRIPTS.

The pre-eminent character of Leo XIII., as pontiff, is his zealous care and work to promote truth, and the truth in literature. Under him the Vatican library, with its exhaustless treasures, is open to the world, and it forms a mine of the richest material to the historian, controversialist, and the seeker after truth. Pope Leo has, within a short time, ordered that the records of the lawsuits of the most celebrated heretics be transferred to the Vatican. There are kept the documents bearing on Bruno's trial at Rome, as well as documents of the civil tribunal, contained chiefly in the Pontifical Registers. From these sources the illustrious antiquarians Mai, Marini, Theiner, and Tosti hav gotten their best and the most valuable information in their histories.

Tosti, by special permission, had access to many unpublished papers when he wrote the life of Boniface VIII. He is now directing the publication of the Registers, those of Clement V. being finished.

The pope sees that the times are prone to listen unfairly to the stories told of the heretics, and fearing that the most celebrated cases will be forgotten at the Holy Office, has ordered their removal to the Vatican library.

A life of Bruno is now being written at the Vatican library, and it will prove, by documentary evidence, that the man whose fame was lauded to the skies by a Brown University professor, and over whose memory Italy rioted a short time since, was guilty of every vice, and his death was a service to society.—Catholic Messenger.

There hav been Catholics who excused the murder of Bruno on the ground of the general ignorance and barbarous spirit of the age, but such apologists seem not to be in harmony with the consensus of Catholic holiness. It is not enough for the church to hav been damnable in the past; it must remain cursed forever to prove its right to the divine commission it claims to hold to destroy whoever has sense, courage, and honor sufficient to see through its shams, expose its hypocrisy, and offer light and liberty to a piety-ruined world. Of course, in the lying reports of the infamous court of the Inquisition any charge can be found against its victims needful to justify it on its own principles for its share in the crime. It is thus that Christianity ever adds insult to injury by repeating the course of the enemies of its own alleged founder. And if the court that crucified Christ is to be believed, he was guilty of every vice, and the world was well rid of a monster by his taking off. JOHN P. GUILD.

"CAN'T I stay home from church with you, pa, just to-day?" pleaded small sinner Bobby. "No, Robert, you must go with your mother." [EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Heston's cartoon of "the rams' horns" reminds me of the following song which I understand was sung as a burlesque at a theater in Buffalo many years ago by men dressed in priestly robes; each sang a verse, and all joined in the chorus. It may be new to many of your readers, and might come in connection with the cartoons very happily.—A. M. R.]

JOSHUA'S RAMS' HORNS.

By the sound of the mighty, but
Crooked old shell,
The walls of old Jericho
Tumbled and fell.
By this if you wish to Know what I am,
I'm a whale among chubs and
"The horn of a ram."

CHORUS: When the world becomes wise,
And the fools are all dead,
We'll quit preaching lies
And work for our bread.

Father Noah, you know, for the Flood made a boat,
When the world was all drowned
The he was afloat;
Cold water was then used
To wash away crime,
For hell wasn't thought of
Till much later time.

CHORUS: When the world becomes wise,
And the fools are all dead,
We'll quit preaching lies
And work for our bread.

What a pity that Moses,
Instead of his frogs,
His pillar of fire,
And his mountain of fogs,
His snake on a pole,
And bread raining dew,
Hadn't thought of a hell
For the stiff-necked Jew.

CHORUS: When the world becomes wise,
And the fools are all dead,
We'll quit preaching lies
And work for our bread.

'Twas the priests of old Rome
Devised the true plan
To govern the world
And punish vile man;
They invented a hell,
'Twas a glorious thought,
And power and riches
Abundantly brought.

CHORUS: When the world becomes wise,
And the fools are all dead,
We'll quit preaching lies
And work for our bread.

'Twas knowledge our ancestors
Stole from the tree
In the garden of Eden which Caused them to see;
But the fruit was forbidden,
They suddenly fell,
And they and their race became
Subjects for hell.

CHORUS: When the world becomes wise,
And the fools are all dead,
We'll quit preaching lies
And work for our bread.

In that golden age, all the Wealth of the East
Was brought in exchange for the
Prayers of the priest;
The priests were lords, lived
Happy and well;
And sinners were prayed for and
Kept out of hell.

CHORUS: When the world becomes wise,
And the fools are all dead,
We'll quit preaching lies
And work for our bread.

Then, sinners, beware, I'm the
"Horn of a ram,"
I can bray down your walls,
I can save or condemn,
I can scare the poor simpleton
Out of his wit,
And Buffalo sink in the Bottomless pit.

CHORUS: When the world becomes wise,
And the fools are all dead,
We'll quit preaching lies
And work for our bread.

Gems of Thought.

THAT is ever the difference between the wise and the unwise; the latter wonders at what is unusual, the wise wonders at the usual.—Emerson.

WONDER is the product of ignorance; admiration is the product of knowledge. Ignorance wonders at the supposed irregularities of nature; science admires its uniformities.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

WHAT mind would be convinced of the being of a God from the witnessing of some temporary change in the laws of nature, when it had totally failed of gaining such conviction from the perpetual and standing wonder of creation itself?—Morell's History of Philosophy.

THE finer part of whey, when shaken, rises and becomes butter. Even so, my child, the finer part of nourishment, when eaten, rises and changes into mind.—Hindoo Vedas.

WHAT first was seed becomes grass, than an ear, then bread, chyle, blood, semen, embryo, man, a corpse, then again earth, stone, or some other mass, and so forth.—Giordano Bruno.

THINK of that wonderful chemistry by which bread was changed into the divine tragedy of "Hamlet!"—Ingersoll.

IT certainly is not so very long since the law of the Persistence of Force has been discovered, and it will still cost much labor to clearly explain, and determin it precisely in its nearest relations, as concerns the transformation of heat into motion, and vice versa. But the time cannot be very distant now when the law will be applied to the problem of thought and sensation. If, under certain conditions, motion is transformed into heat, why may it not, under other conditions, be transformed into sensation? The conditions, the requisit apparatus, exist in the brain and nervous system of the higher animals, and in those organs which represent these among the lower orders. On the one side an internal motion is occasioned by contact with a nerve; on the other an idea is roused by a sensation or a perception; and vice versa, on their way from within outward, sensation and thought are transformed into bodily motion.—Strauss.

TOWNS upon acquiring the right of community, became so many little republics, governed by known and equal laws. Liberty was deemed such an essential and characteristic part in their constitution, that if any slave took refuge in one of them, and resided there a year without being claimed, he was instantly declared a freeman, and admitted as a member of the community. These communities, or free cities, were so favorable to freedom, that they were distinguished by the name of Libertates. They were at first extremely odious to the nobles, who foresaw what a check they must prove to their power and domination. Guibert, abbot of Nogent, calls them execrable inventions, by which, contrary to law and justice, slaves withdrew themselvs from that obedience which they owed to their masters. The zeal with which some of the nobles and powerful ecclesiastics opposed the establishment of communities, and endeavored to circumscribe their privileges, was extraordinary. A striking instance of this occurs in the contest between the archbishop of Reims and the inhabitants of that community. It was the chief business of every archbishop during a considerable time, to abridge the rights and jurisdiction of the community; and the great object of the citizens, especially when the see was vacant, to maintain, to recover, and to extend their own jurisdiction.—Robertson's Survey of the State of Europe.

IF the people do not bring the clergy under control, they will bring the people into abject slavery, and keep them there. In every nation on earth they hav done so; what should change their character here?—Dr. Thomas Cooper.

ALL that was good and great was without the pale of the church, and in spite of it. The bravery, the gallantry of the age, the knight-errantry, the father of the politeness of the present age, took its rise without the church. The liberty of the nobles was sustained against the power of royalty by their own right arm.—Gilbert Vale.

WE did not get our freedom from the church. The great truth, that all men are by nature free, was never told on Sinai's barren crags, nor by the lonely shores of Galilee.—Ingersoll.

THE inventors of the dogma of eternal hell-torments, hav made of that God, whom they call so good, the most detestable of beings. Cruelty in men is the last act of wickedness. Every sensible mind must revolt at the bare recital of the torments inflicted on the greatest criminal; but cruelty is much more apt to excite indignation, when void of motive. The most sanguinary tyrants, the Caligulas, the Neros, the Domitians, had, at least, some motivs for tormenting their victims, and insulting their sufferings.—D'Holbach.

I HAV insisted, and still insist, that it is impossible for a finite man to commit a crime deserving infinit punishment.—Ingersoll.

JOHN W. CHADWICK, the cultivated poet-preacher of Brooklyn, has issued a volume of sixteen sermons. In one of these he says: "It is Jesus himself who is the unflinching enunciator of the doctrin of an eternal and fiery hell;" and that "the Unitarian doctrin of human nature, which insists upon its dignity and grandeur," bears to Paul's epistles "a relation of antagonism pure and simple."

WHEN the original Westminster Assembly was holding its sessions in England in 1644, the outcry against toleration was terrific. Nearly two hundred distinct heresies were cataloged, covering all the Freethinking done since the world began, and scarcely surpassed in our own day. Parliament was reminded of the danger of these tendencies, and that "to set the door so wide open as to tolerate all religions," would be to "make London an Amsterdam," and would lead to—in fact would certainly lead to—Amsterdamnation.

AT Cincinnati on a late Sunday night Manager Fennessy gave a musical entertainment at one of his theaters, and he and others who participated were arrested. It was regarded as an effort to resume Sunday theatrical entertainments. The court found that the statute clearly prohibited on Sunday any theatrical or dramatic performances, as well as various other performances, but that it is silent as to a musical performance. The rule requiring criminal statutes to be strictly construed prevents making a musical performance a crime or misdemeanor by implication, and hence the defendants were dismissed. This will open the theaters to Sunday concerts if they choose to try them.

INTENSE excitement was created at Goochland Court House, Va., on the night of the 26th ult. during a church meeting by the appearance of Amy Boggs, a small colored girl, in the congregation, flourishing a razor. Men, women, and children ran in all directions. Some women fainted, others tumbled in the mud, and the girl was soon in possession of the church, her eyes glaring and her slight figure trembling with frenzy. When she had driven the last person from the church, she cried out: "Now I want to see the devil." She was finally overpowered by two constables, and an examination showed that she was in a religious ecstasy and was looking for the devil, whose throat she had taken a vow to cut. It was fortunate that the congregation fled before her, as she had been told that the devil was in some people, and she designed cutting them open to get at him.

THE Christian Intelligencer (Reformed) says: "Cardinal Gibbons has issued a circular, backing up the allocution of the pope condemning the Italians for erecting a statue of Giordano Bruno in Rome. He has probably made a mistake. Bruno was not what he says he was. He was not an 'Atheist,' or a 'wild theorizer,' or a 'shameless writer.' He was a Neo-Platonist, and in a degree a disciple of Ramond Lully. He believed the supreme being to be the soul of the world, and tended toward pantheism. He was a man of learning, and lived a better life than a great many of the priests of his day. He was burnt at the stake by Pope Clement VIII., because he would not retract his philosophical opinions, among them being that the stars are suns with systems revolving around them. He was a martyr to the right of private judgment, and for this reason Italians honor him. He was not put to death by the secular authorities, but by the pope. Americans hav no sympathy with burning a man at the stake on account of his opinions. The cardinal makes the point that Bruno denied the divinity of Christ. Does he hold, then, that Unitarians ought to be burnt at the stake? If so, Americans disagree with him heartily."

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

CHAPTER II.

REVIEW OF CHRISTIAN TESTIMONY.—HOLLAND AND BATEMAN.

Character of Holland's "Life of Lincoln"—The Bateman Interview—Inconsistency and Untruthfulness of Its Statements—Holland's Subsequent Modification and Final Abandonment of his Original Claims.

In the preceding chapter has been presented the Christian side of this question. It has been presented fully and fairly. Even the Christian claimant must admit that it is the longest and most comprehensiv array of testimony that has yet been published in support of his claim. This evidence is explicit and apparently conclusiv. To attempt its refutation may seem presumptuous. And yet, in the face of all this evidence, the writer does not hesitate to declare that Abraham Lincoln was not a Christian, and pledge himself to refute the statements of these witnesses by a volume of testimony that is irresistible and overwhelming.

Before introducing this testimony the evidence already adduced will be reviewed. This evidence may properly be grouped into three divisions: 1. The testimony of Holland and Bateman; 2 The testimony of Reed and his witnesses; 3. The testimony of Arnold and the miscellaneous evidence remaining.

Holland's "Life of Lincoln," in a literary point of view, is a work of more than ordinary merit. It possesses a beauty of diction and an intellectual vigor seldom surpassed, but as an authority it is unreliable. Like Weems's "Life of Washington," it is simply a biographical romance founded upon fact, but paying little regard to facts in working up the details. Following the natural bent of Christian biographers, Holland parades the subject of his work as a model of Christian piety. He knew that this was false; for, while he was unacquainted with Lincoln, he had been apprised of his unbelief—had been repeatedly told of it before he wrote his biography. But this did not deter him from asserting the contrary. He knew that if he stated the facts the clergy would condemn his book. They needed the influence of Lincoln's great name to support their crumbling creed, and would hav it at any sacrifice, particularly when its possession required no greater sacrifice than truth. Holland was equal to the emergency. When one of Lincoln's friends in Springfield suggested that the less said about his religious views the better, he promptly replied: "Oh, never mind; I'll fix that." And he did. With dramatic embellishments, he presented to the delight of the orthodox world the now famous, or rather infamous, Bateman interview.

The publication of this story produced a profound sensation among the personal friends of the dead president. It revealed to them the unpleasant fact, assuming Holland's account to be correct, either that Newton Bateman, who had hitherto borne the reputation of being a man of veracity, was an unscrupulous liar, or that Abraham Lincoln, whose reputation for honesty and candor, long anterior to 1860, had become proverbial, was a consummate hypocrit; and loath as they were to believe the former, they rejected with disdain the latter.

Referring to this story, Lamon, in his "Life of Lincoln," says:

There is no dealing with Mr. Bateman except by a flat contradiction. Perhaps his memory was treacherous or his imagination led him astray, or, peradventure, he thought a fraud no harm if it gratified the strong desire of the public for proofs of Mr. Lincoln's orthodoxy (Life of Lincoln, p. 501).

While Bateman undoubtedly misrepresented Lincoln in his account of their conversation—for it is not denied that he had an interview with Lincoln—it is quite probable that he did not to the extent represented by Holland. Bateman doubtless exaggerated the affair, and Holland magnified Bateman's report of it. In an article originally published in the Index and subsequently quoted by Lamon, Lincoln's law partner, Mr. Herndon, says:

I doubt whether Mr. Bateman said in full what is recorded there. I doubt a great deal of it. I know the whole story is untrue—untrue in substance, untrue in fact and spirit. As soon as the [Holland's] "Life of Lincoln" was out, on reading that part here referred to, I instantly sought Mr. Bateman and found him in his office. I spoke to him politely and kindly, and he spoke to me in the same manner. I said substantially to him that Mr. Holland, in order to make Mr. Lincoln a technical Christian, made him a hypocrit; and so his "Life of Lincoln" quite plainly says. I loved Mr. Lincoln, and was mortified, if not angry, to see him made a hypocrit. I cannot now detail what Mr. Bateman said, as it was a private conversation, and I am forbidden to make use of it in public. If some good gentleman can only get the seal of secrecy removed I can show what was said and done. On my word, the world may take it for granted that Holland is wrong—that he does not state Mr. Lincoln's views correctly (Lamon's Life of Lincoln, p. 496).

In a lecture on "Lincoln's Religion," delivered in Springfield in 1874, alluding to the same subject, Mr. Herndon says:

My notes of our conversation bear date December 3, 12, and 28, 1865. Our conversations were private, I suppose. However, I can say this much: that Mr. Bateman expressly told me Mr. Lincoln was, in the conversation related in Holland, talking politics and not religion, nor Christianity, nor morals, as such. I hav persistently dogged Mr. Bateman for the privilege of publishing my notes, or to giv me a letter explaining what Mr. Lincoln did say, so that I might make known the facts of the case. Mr. Bateman has as stoutly refused.

Dr. Bateman finally permitted Mr. Herndon to make public a letter, marked "confidential," which he had written Mr. Herndon in 1867. In this letter Bateman says:

He [Lincoln] was applying the principles of moral and religious truth to the duties of the hour, the condition of the country, and the conduct of public men—ministers of the gospel. I had no thought of orthodoxy or heterodoxy, Unitarianism, Trinitarianism, or any other ism, during the whole conversation, and I don't suppose or believe he had.

Had Lincoln made the confession he is reported to hav made, this would hav suggested to Mr. Bateman the idea of his admitted orthodoxy as well as his reputed heterodoxy. Had Lincoln declared that "Christ is God," this would hav suggested to him the idea of Trinitarianism. It will be seen, even from this letter, that instead of talking theology and professing a belief in Christianity, he was talking politics and denouncing the intolerance and bigotry of Christian ministers.

Dr. Bateman privately asserts that he was not correctly reported, that Holland's version of the interview "is colored." It is to be regretted that he had not the courage to state this fact to the public, and his plea, "My aversion to publicity in such matters is intense," is a poor apology for refusing to do so.

As previously intimated, this story is probably founded on fact and has an element of truth in it. Lincoln and Bateman had a political interview, and the object of this interview was the examination and discussion of the list of Springfield voters. This list revealed the fact that twenty out of twenty-three clergymen and a very large majority of the church-members of Springfield were opposed to Lincoln. The significance of this fact Dr. Holland and Dr. Bateman hav apparently overlooked. Why was the church opposed to him? It must hav been either because it was opposed to the Republican party, or because he was personally objectionable to its members. His political principles were the principles of his party, his ability was conceded, and his moral character was above reproach. It is fair to assume that the political sentiment of the Christians of Springfield was substantially the political sentiment of Northern Christians generally. Now, was the Northern church overwhelmingly in favor of the extension of slavery? Were eighty-seven per cent of Northern Christians Democrats? Or did the Christians of Springfield oppose Lincoln because he was an Infidel?

Holland makes Bateman affirm that Lincoln "drew from his bosom a pocket New Testament." It is generally believed by Lincoln's friends that he did not hav a New Testament, that the only book used in the interview was the book containing the list of Springfield voters. One of them says: "The idea that Mr. Lincoln carried the New Testament or Bible in his bosom or boots, to draw on his opponents in debate, is ridiculous." It is possible, however, that there was a New Testament in the room, and that Lincoln used it to enforce an argument. Indeed, there is internal evidence in the story, aside from the declaration of Bateman, that such was the case. The central idea in his political creed—the keynote of his campaigns, both in 1858 and in 1860—was contained in that memorable passage, "'A house divided against itself cannot stand.' This government can not endure permanently half slave and half free." The figure quoted was a familiar and a powerful one, and Lincoln recognized its force in dealing with the masses. It was taken from the New Testament, and from the words of Christ himself. That he should use it against those Christians who were acting contrary to this well-known truth, is not strange. Immediately after the declaration, "Christ is God," he is reported as saying: "I hav told them that a house divided against itself cannot stand, and Christ and reason say the same." This furnishes a solution to the whole story. This shows what he was doing with a New Testament. In connection with this, nothing is more natural than that he should exclaim: "Christ teaches it, and Christ is [their] God!" That he was terribly in earnest, that he was deeply agitated and pained to learn that his Christian neighbors were opposed to him, is not improbable. Thus the incidents of a simple political interview that were natural and reasonable hav been perverted to make it appear that he was a Christian. A mere reference to the New Testament and Christ hav been twisted into an acknowledgment of their divinity. Bateman himself admits that Lincoln said: "I am not a Christian." Why not accept his statement, then? Why distort his words and in the face of this positiv declaration attempt to prove that he was a Christian? Bateman reports him as modifying the statement by adding: "God knows I would be one." Yes, "God knows I would be one were I convinced that Christianity is true, but not convinced of its truth, I am an unbeliever."

Lincoln is also reported to hav said that in the light of the New Testament "human bondage can not liv a moment." But he did not utter these words. He did not utter them because they are untrue, and none knew this better than himself. He knew that in the light of this book human bondage had lived for nearly two thousand years; he knew that this book was one of the great bulwarks of human slavery; he knew that there was not to be found between its lids a single text condemning slavery, while there were to be found a score of texts sustaining it; he knew that that infamous law, the Fugitiv Slave law, received its warrant from this book—that Paul, in the light of its earliest teachings, had returned a fugitiv slave to his master.

In this story Lincoln is charged with the grossest hypocrisy. He is declared to hav professed a belief in Christ and Christianity, and when Bateman observed that his friends were ignorant of this, he is made to reply: "I know they are. I am obliged to appear different to them." Now, to use Lincoln's own words, "A sane person can no more act without a motiv than can there be an effect without a cause," and what possible motiv could he hav had for such conduct? Supposing that he was base enough to be a hypocrit, what could induce him to lead the world to suppose that he was an Infidel if he were not? In the eyes of the more ignorant and bigoted class of Christians, Infidelity is a more heinous crime than murder, and an Infidel is a creature scarcely to be tolerated, much less to be intrusted with a public office. Freethinkers generally detest the dogmas of Christianity as thoroughly as Christians possibly can the principles of Freethought. But free thought and free speech are the leading tenets of their creed. They recognize the fact that we are all the children of circumstances, that our belief is determined by our environments, and while they reject Christianity, they hav nothing but charity for those who conscientiously profess it. They may repudiate a bigot, but will not oppose a man merely because he is a Christian. If Lincoln were an Infidel, discretion might urge a concealment of his view; if he were a Christian, policy would prompt him to giv it as wide publicity as possible, especially when he rested under the imputation of being a disbeliever. Had he changed his belief and become a convert to Christianity, a knowledge of the fact would not hav lost him the support of his friends, even though some of them were Freethinkers; while it would hav secured for him a more cordial support from the Republican side of the church, many of whom had been alienated on account of his supposed Antichristian sentiments. It is hard to believe that Lincoln was a hypocrit; but this story, if true, makes him not only a hypocrit but a fool. If he believed in Christianity there can be but one reason advanced for his desiring to keep it a secret—he was ashamed of it.

Holland, in trying to explain away the inconsistencies of this fabrication, repeatedly blunders. In one of his attempts he makes use of the following remarkable language:

It was one of the peculiarities of Mr. Lincoln to hide these religious experiences from the eyes of the world. . . . They [his friends] did not regard him as a religious man. They had never seen anything but the activ lawyer, the keen politician, the jovial, fun-loving companion, in Mr. Lincoln. All this department of his life he had kept carefully hidden from them. Why he should say that he was obliged to appear differently to others does not appear; but the fact is a matter of history that he never exposed his own religious life to those who had no sympathy with it. It is doubtful whether the clergymen of Springfield knew anything of these experiences (Life of Lincoln, pp. 239, 240).

What! had the clergymen of Springfield no sympathy with a religious life? A person can utter one falsehood with some degree of plausibility; but when he attempts to verify it by uttering another, he usually trips and falls. The above passage is mere hypocritical cant. It carries with it, not only its own refutation, but the rest of Holland's testimony also. It is the language of a man who is conscious of having stated a falsehood; conscious that there are others who believe it to be a falsehood. He knew that the personal friends of Lincoln all understood him to be a disbeliever. He knew that the church-members of Springfield all entertained the same opinion. He virtually says to these people: "It is true that Lincoln professed to be an Infidel, but he was not; he was a Christian. The fact has been kept a profound secret. Bateman and I hav been the sole custodians of this secret, and we now giv it to the world."

A Christian writer, apologizing for the absurd and contradictory statements of Holland and Bateman, says, "They aimed at the truth." I do not believe it. It is clearly evident that they aimed at a plausible lie. But in either case they made a bad shot.

In his "Life of Lincoln," Holland endeavors to convey the impression that Lincoln was always a devout Christian. He declares that even during the years of his early manhood at New Salem, "he was a religious man;" that "he had a deep religious life." When Herndon and Lamon exposed his shameful misrepresentations he retreated from his first position, and in Scribner's Monthly wrote as follows:

What Abraham Lincoln was when he lived at New Salem and wrote an Antichristian tract (which the friend to whom he showed it somewhat violently but most judiciously put in the fire) is one thing, and it may be necessary for an impartial historian to record it. What he was when he died at Washington with those most Christian words of the second inaugural upon his lips, and that most Christian record of five years of patient tenderness and charity behind him, is quite another thing.

He admits that Lincoln was an Infidel in Illinois, but would hav us believe that he was a Christian in Washington. He refers to "those most Christian words of the second inaugural," and "that most Christian record of five years of patient tenderness and charity." In the second inaugural there is not a word affirming a belief in Christianity—not a word in reference to Christianity. He mentions God, and quotes from the Bible, but does not intimate that the Bible is God's word. That Christians hav a monopoly of "patient tenderness and charity," can hardly be accepted. The history of the church does not confirm this assumption. Many Christians hav possessed these virtues. So hav the votaries of other religions. These attributes belong to good men everywhere, but they are the distinguishing features of no particular creed.

Smarting under his exposure, with that whining cant so peculiar to the vanquished religionist, Holland finally sent forth this parting wail and virtually abandoned the whole case:

The question is, not whether Abraham Lincoln was a subscriber to the creeds of orthodoxy, but whether he was a believing—that is to say, a truthful Christian man; not whether he was accustomed to call Jesus Christ "Lord, Lord," but whether he was used to do those things which Jesus Christ exemplified and enforced. He was accustomed, as we know well enough, to speak of an almighty father, of whom justice and mercy and sympathy with weak and suffering humanity were characteristic attributes. Who was it that revealed to man a God like this? Who was it that once "showed us the father and it sufficed us?" Whoever it was that made this revelation to mankind it was of him that this man, even though he knew it not, had learned, and it was in his spirit that he acted (Scribner's Monthly).

The concluding words of Dr. Holland's testimony, as quoted from his "Life of Lincoln," are as follows:

Moderate, frank, truthful, gentle, forgiving, loving, just, Mr. Lincoln will always be remembered as eminently a Christian president; and the almost immeasurably great results which he had the privilege of achieving, were due to the fact that he was a Christian president.

This prediction and this assumption are false. I change one word and make them grandly true.

Moderate, frank, truthful, gentle, forgiving, loving, just, Mr. Lincoln will always be remembered as eminently a Liberal president; and the almost immeasurably great results which he had the privilege of achieving were due to the fact that he was a Liberal president.

Intimations of Modern Science.

A GRAIN OF SAND.

Amongst the contents of a pail just brought from the Long island coast, says Annie Chambers-Ketchum in the Home Journal, and emptied into this glass basin filled with salt water on my table, is a riband of sea-wrack bossed with pulpy masses—a stranded colony. Restored, however, to their nativ medium, these homely lumps are soon transfigured; rose-tangles and sea-firs, still growing together in the old primeval comradeship, stretch out their tiny limbs and branches, making a world of their own; whilst one by one the grains of sand sink to the floor of this mimic sea.

Man has known experimentally from the beginning of his history that the animal depends chiefly upon the plant for sustenance, and that the plant depends upon the soil, moisture, air, heat, and light. Choosing the rich valleys for his home—those not only best protected by mountain walls, but also best watered by mountain streams—he found in the brook running through his meadows agate pebbles or the stem of some fossil sea-lily, which he tossed to his children at play on the banks. The farmer thus opened the first school not only of botany and zoology, but of geology as well. In like manner the miner was the first mineralogist; and to these unlettered toilers the student owes the key to the solution of his most perplexing problems. They discovered for him the fossil ancestors of these sea-folk swimming in my bowl of water—royal folk, whose lineage makes our proudest human heraldry dwindle to a geometric point of plebeian insignificance. We hav read only a line of that cosmic decalog written on tables of stone, in pictographs that need no translator, and sealed up in the solid globe æons upon æons before Moses ascended the mount. Yet, little as we know, we hav found in these few words—although they are the last that hav been written—a more eloquent sermon than our pigmy human wits had ever conceived.

Underneath this school of fossils there is another, the living laboratory of the minerals. First entered by the cupidity of man in his greed for gold, the scientist was afterward called in for consultation and help. The separating funnel, the furnace, the microscope, and micro-chemical tests were applied. Energy and forces were inquired into; life, ever confronting us, ever defying us, was hunted to its source as far as the mind of man in his present state can approach thereto.

We here learn a profounder lesson: That minerals, like plants and animals, are constantly activ; that they take forms which are inherent; that they pass through successiv periods of development. We see the crystal arrested in every degree of change; the beautiful mimic "growth-forms," as they are called, are really stages of growth—no more like the perfected crystal than the acorn is like the oak. And just as each plant and animal fits itself to its surroundings, so does each restless, never-tiring molecule, each crystal, each mountain mass. The difference lies in the relativ length of time required for rock-growth, which is an eternity compared with the life of any of the things we call living. We think, amazed, of the dragon's blood tree and the Californian pine, still vigorous and fruitful though they sprouted before Babylon was built. We wonder at the potential energy stored up in grains of wheat that lay in an Egyptian mummy-case three thousand years. What shall we say of the vitality of a crystal, arrested for millions of years, yet growing again when placed in friendly environments and completing its life-round without deformity or loss of physical beauty?

It seems illogical to retain such terms as chemical and physical forces, inorganic and organic bodies. All separating distinctions fade before the interaction of diverse elements and forces seen everywhere in nature. It changed the nummulites into the stone of which the pyramids are built; coral and shell into Parian limestone and this again into statuary marble; clay into sapphire, carbon into diamond. Its magic crucible converted into emerald and ruby the silex of the primitiv granit from which the sands in this bowl on my table were broken millions of years ago. Farther still these broken bits of crystal take us. With their molecular structure, their affinities, their correspondence to the agencies about them, they giv birth to other structures, too small to be discerned by the most powerful microscope, yet playing with light as if it were their toy; the opal, eldest child of beauty, was born of silex, water, and fire.

Led by this lovely priestess we penetrate to the holy of holies. We see that our globe itself, waltzing its rhythmic round about the sun, is, as it were, an animal made up of countless myriads of creatures, and that the modern things upon it which we call living, are the only things that die. Its entrails and heart are molten minerals; its arteries and veins are the ocean currents and rivers. The vital fluid circulates through every duct and pore, from center to circumference. We see—though we cannot comprehend the stupendous truth—that our sun, the source of our terrestrial life, is a star in the midst of millions of kindred stars, each no doubt with its attendant earths; and that the autobiography of each of these is lithographed within it.

Life then is inherent in all things; dependent absolutely upon mutual attractions, the interaction of bodies, atoms, molecules, each one of which is an ego, an existence; potential—to what extent who shall dare prophecy? This grain of sand, born trillions upon trillions of years ago and trillions of years old, is still alive and young, ready to put forth new energies and to giv birth to higher forms at the awakening of some kindred touch. Trillions—we cannot conceive them; we can only utter the word in a dazed, stupid way. And if this grain of sand is so old, how old is the earth, the sun, the universe?

There is no life without heat and motion. Heat is the source of energy, and to be effectiv it must be unequally diffused; that is, there must be more heat in one agent than another. But we are told that there is another law: though heat may be transformed into work (motion) all of the heat thus used can never be reconverted into heat by any process yet known to man. It follows then that the energy of our earth is gradually changing into heat, and that the time may come when, equally heated throughout, the globe will be an inert mass from which motion—and therefore life, beauty, and grace—will hav perished. Is this a process leading to the end?

Time is the measure of duration. And duration—what is it? Can we conceive of it except in connection with something that continues, that lasts?

The setting sun glows through yonder mists like a great fiery dial without index. Where are we, we mites parasitic on a larger mite whirling through space? Whence came we? Whither are we going, in this swift, silent, complex, immeasurable journey across the infinit abysses? And whither—ah whither! are ye gone, ye who made all bitter things sweet, all impossible things easy?

The flower arrays herself in colors to allure the bee that brings her love's message. The modest, serious, religious maiden blushes with instinctiv aspiration for the mysterious sacrament which is to make her a wife and mother. So, at the very source of life, in this laboratory of our earth's chemistry, we find the same allurement and aspiration. Who shall say these molecules are unconscious in the supreme moment of chemical union? That their bliss is relativly less than ours?

Step by step, from that first nuptial hour when chaos began to round itself in the womb of the morning, we see harmonious attractions in sea and earth; the voiceless loves of the first plants and animals, these aborigines in my basin; the sportiv delight of bee and butterfly, bird and beast, the joy of human bride and bridegroom, the ecstasy of motherhood. Love, the primal and eternal sacrament; the mother of religion, self-sacrifice, duty, virtue—this, too, is an unalterable law. One inherent love made all that is loveliest in atom or star, all that is loveliest in the human soul. Shall it not awake in us, then, in another stage or cycle of existence, like the potential energy of the interrupted crystal? Shall not the opal of a higher reunion be the reward of kindred souls that hav gone through the crucible of tears and fire?

What are we? We, the youngest born of creatures? We are not merely the slime of the earth converted into bone and flesh. I, myself, I built this house I liv in. I made the frown that disfigures my forehead; I made the cynical lines that destroy the beauty of my mouth. You made the house you liv in; your sweetness, your patience, your wisdom gave to your brow its perfect calm, to your lips their friendly smile, to your voice its winning pathos. As faithfully as the crystal you hav adjusted yourself to your environments, you hav corresponded to the agencies that make all things divine. I hav deflected from them; I am therefore abortiv, unsightly, repulsiv.

In the midst of the dissonances, the tumults, the conflicts physical, mental, and spiritual, which harass us on every side, we hear voices no logic can silence. They come from regions no mathematician can define. They call us forth from cities, from the strifes of men, to the primeval woods, to the seashore, to the mountain tops; they arouse desires and longings no earthly love can satisfy. Listening to them the uproar which confounded us is resolved into the concordia discors. There is one harmony from within and from without; it tells us that in every discord there are the elements of concord. It tells us that death is but another name for peace. Let that deep sleep continue for a longer time than the earth has existed; let that new body be angel, opal, crystal, or one of the infinitesimal particles that form the periphery of a soap-bubble, we shall awake; we shall be rehabilitated; we shall know even as also we are known.

A Modest Request.

At its closing session in Indianapolis, Ind., September 18th, the convention, in mass meeting, discussed "how best to promote the interest of the Baptist church," and the following resolutions were adopted:

WHEREAS, This body, the National Baptist Convention, regards itself as the representativ body of all the colored people of the United States of America, as we are under commission from God to teach all men, and,

WHEREAS, Our political leaders are few, and even those we hav cannot reach the people, therefore it becomes our duty to speak out upon all questions that affect our people, socially and economically, as well as religious, and,

WHEREAS, God has always in all ages instructed and ruled the people through his own chosen agents called men, therefore be it

Resolved, First, That this convention believes that the truest interests of our people are in their acceptance of Horace Greeley's doctrin of "Young man, go West," whence they may obtain lands and grow up with the country.

Second, That poor and oppressed people who hav migrated Westward where they could get land in new countries hav grown up with them and become the great men of these countries.

Third, That we ask the president of the United States to recommend to the United States Congress an appropriation of $100,000,000 to aid the colored people to leave the South.

A committee was appointed to wait upon the president and lay the resolutions before him.

Does not this look as if the various Christian churches intend to make the most of their opportunity while a Christian man is at the head of our government, and get the earth and all therein "to promote the interest" each of his own denomination? Will the mass of non-Christians and anti-Christians awake from their lethargy, or still sleep on until this republic becomes a theocracy beyond redemption?

Volumes might be said on these resolutions and this movement, but I forbear. ELLA E. GIBSON.

Thomas Jefferson's Last Words.

In THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 28, 1889, in a footnote to an article on "Death," "Burr" says that the last words of Thomas Jefferson were: "I hav done for my country and for mankind all that I could do, and I now resign my soul without fear to God, my daughter to my country."

I saw the same alleged last words in another paper some months ago, and thinking that it carried internal evidence of the usual ghoulish lie on dead unbelievers, I investigated it, and found that Jefferson's last words and the circumstances of his death were as follows:

Jefferson knew he was dying, and he wanted to die on the Fourth of July. As the time wore on toward morning, he said to Mr. Trist: "This is the Fourth." Mr. Trist nodded. "Ah!" murmured Jefferson with an expression of satisfaction. Then he sank into unconsciousness.

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

The Coming Congress.

The prospects are good for a large attendance from all parts of the country, and we intend to do something besides talk. Let all who hav anything to say, come and say it, "or forever hereafter hold their peace." The meetings will be held in Industrial Hall, on Broad street, west side, between Wood and Vine streets—a very central location. The building contains rooms of different sizes, so we can use smaller or larger ones, as occasion may require. The first meeting will be held on Friday evening, October 25th, at 8 o'clock, and will be devoted to preliminary business, and probably the president's opening address will be delivered. On Saturday morning, at 10 o'clock, a general conference will be held, and the regular business of the Congress transacted. Saturday afternoon will be devoted to visiting Independence Hall, Girard College, and other places of interest, unless it shall be found necessary to hold an afternoon session. On Saturday night and Sunday afternoon and evening public meetings will be held, and addresses delivered by able speakers, to be announced as soon as the program is complete. No arrangements hav been made for reduced railroad fares, or hotel rates. The Girard House, Chestnut and Ninth streets, charges $3 per day, and the Bingham House, Market and Eleventh streets, and the Washington House, Chestnut and Seventh streets, charge $2.50 per day, and the latter will make some reduction of rates if several persons come together. I recommend the Washington House as the rendezvous of the Liberal clans. We shall probably hav five or six public platform speeches, and several volunteer addresses. Let all our friends, and enemies, if we hav any, come prepared to speak. Let our friends send forward their contributions toward paying expenses, at once, or write me what to depend upon. We hav received less than $100 since September 1st, and the treasury was empty then. "A word to the wise," etc.

The International Freethought Congress at Paris.

We condense the report of this congress from the London Freethinker, the editors of which, Messrs. Foote and Wheeler, were delegates.

As far as the representation of nationalities was concerned, the Paris congress must be pronounced a great success. All the world and his wife desired to see the Centennial Exposition, and although this and the other attractions of Paris prevented many delegates, notably the foreign ones, from giving their constant attention to every sitting, there was always a good representation of the principal European countries, though the representativs were by no means always the same. If much real work was not done, there was at least a good deal of acquaintance made and fraternal feeling exchanged.

The first sitting of the congress was almost entirely taken up by M. Pasquier calling the roll of the societies who were represented and who sent adhesions. Citoyen Okecki, a refugee Pole, was called to preside. On the commission of the press Mr. Wheeler was nominated, together with Dr. De Paepe, M. Schaere, and four others.

It was somewhat unfortunate that the congress was held so near the time of the elections, as it prevented the French papers from giving it the publicity desired. Moreover, as political feeling runs very high among the Freethinking groups, as well as elsewhere, there is no doubt the congress would hav received more attention in quieter times. The best thanks of the party are due to M. M. Clemetshaw and Pasquier for their hard work to make it a success. The fine hall of the Syndical chambers of the tenth arrondissement of Paris was handsomely decorated with the banners of the Freethought groups, and there was a suite of rooms for the convenience of the delegates. Mr. Truelove brought over a bust and portrait of Paine which he intends presenting to the municipal council of Paris.

Our Belgian friends, who are the center of the international movement, mustered in strong force. Altogether about a hundred were present. The German Freethinkers sent Dr. Voelkel, of Magdeburg, and Otto Friederici, of Berlin. Sweden sent Mr. Knut Wicksell, and also asked Messrs. Foote and Wheeler to represent them.

M. Adolphe Deluc, of Brussels, formally opened the congress on Sunday afternoon, and reminded the meeting of the great events of the Revolution, when Bishop Gobel and other church dignitaries publicly renounced religion, and gave their adhesion to the principles of the republic. Freethought was spreading to day. In Italy the statue to Bruno, in France those to Voltaire, Diderot, and Dolet, were signs of progress. The peoples were now fraternizing at the Exhibition on the Champs de Mars. They must aim now at what had been called "holy equality." Laws in favor of religion must be repealed, and the people work out their own salvation without God or master.

M. Deluc was then chosen to preside, with Herr Friederici to represent Germany, and Mr. Holyoake for England. Madam Tessier was also called to the platform. M. Pasquier was then elected general secretary, Dr. Voelkel secretary for England, M. Clemetshaw Cilwa for France, M. Okecki for Poland, and M. Madiera for Spain. Representativs of various nationalities then spoke of the condition of Freethought.

M. Fournemont, for Belgium, in a very able speech, declared that Freethought was making great progress. Like the priests, they were paying attention to the children. They looked forward to a Socialist solution of economic problems. M. Odin then made an energetic and eloquent speech for France, which was much applauded. Mr. Holyoake said he came from the coöperativ congress to this one of the independent thinkers who made coöperation possible. Freethought was a condition of the progress of nations. Where would science be but for Freethought, its nursing mother? Theology is dying of mediocrity. The miracle bubbles which the Jews blew in the air of wonder two thousand years ago still delight the childhood of churches to-day. The sea of theology had been stagnant centuries ago had not the great Freethinkers of the past, at the peril of their lives, put some salt of reason into it. Society does not as yet recognize that we make sacrifices to serve it.

Mlle. Mario Chelago Loewy spoke for Poland. Dr. Voelkel, delegate of many German societies, was well received, and M. Mariol, of Barcelona, for Spain. This ardent Spaniard gave a long and fiery discourse, in which he professed himself a partisan of the method of Voltaire to kill superstition by ridicule. Mr. Wheeler put in a letter received from Sweden, stating that Mr. Lennstrand was again on trial during the sitting of the conference. A telegram of sympathy was voted by acclamation. Commissions of business were appointed to regulate the proceedings of the conference.

At the evening sitting M. Schaehre gave an excellent address on the necessity of showing the world we had philosophical principles. Dr. Regnard gave the resumé of a learned paper which he had prepared on the origin and evolution of religions.

Monday was to hav been the day for the reception by the Paris municipal council, but that being postponed, the day was occupied by visits to the Pantheon and the statues of Voltaire, Rousseau, Dolet, and Diderot.

At the Monday sitting Frau Hedwig Henrich Wilhelmi, from America, presided, assisted by M. Fournemont, of Brussels, and M. Odou de Buen, of Las Dominicales, Madrid. Mr. Truelove placed at the service of the congress a fine bust and likeness of Thomas Paine, which he intends to giv to the city of Paris. M. Odin said that the bust of Paine, who had fought for Freethought and republicanism in England, America, and France, was a sign of the international fraternization of peoples.

The subject of the evening sitting was the influence of the Revolution of 1789 on Freethought, and valuable historical discourses were delivered by Citizens Fournemont and Odou de Buen, of which more anon.

The question of the rights of women at a later session brought up a whole crowd of able speakers. The chair was taken by M. Navez, the report was read by Mme. Barbarousse, who affirmed the absolute equality of the two sexes, and demanded for women both civil and political rights. This was supported by Mr. Knut Wicksell, the Swedish delegate, and by Frau Hedwig Henrich Wilhelmi, who denied men's rights to fix women's duties. One French delegate, a Socialist, affirmed the superiority of woman and demanded "the abolition of the tyranny of marriage." Dr. Wiet (Belgium) wanted to know, if women were superior, how it was that they were the great supporters of the church. In the end, a resolution was passed, affirming that to bring woman out of the power of the priests, she must be granted equality of rights.

It was not till Thursday evening, when M. Jules Lemaitre, of Liège, presided, that the application of Freethought principles to the questions of education and legislativ reform were arrived at. The report on the sixth question, which demanded the separation of church and state, and the suppression of all religious teaching in schools, was succinctly read by M. Jules Allix, and a formula to that effect, moved by Citizen Schaere, was eventually adopted.

On the seventh question, dealing with the legislativ and social reforms, the report of the Belgian societies affirmed that the wealth of the clergy was a danger to society, and demanded the abolition of the convents.

Dr. De Paepe spoke to the point upon cremation and the laicisation of hospitals. He pointed out that the Freethinkers of Liège had themselvs taken the initiativ of action, and provided for the civil funerals of their members. He advocates the formation of a corps of secular nurses who would both attend to the sick in hospitals, and also go out to their homes. M. Hy. Vaudemont, of Charenton, remarked that in Paris they were behind the Belgians in the matter of funerals. Freethinkers were forced to pay just as much to the church at funerals as if their friends were buried by the priests, an iniquity against which the meeting was emphatic in its protest.

On the question of statistics M. Schaere gave an account of the French budget des cultes, which he affirmed was something enormous, and in itself a cause of poverty. Messrs. Foote and Robertson spoke as to the revenues of the Church of England, and similar information was supplied from the delegates of other countries. It was decided that further information should be gathered in order to make as complete and as exact as possible the information in the compte rendus, or report, which it was decided at the outset of the proceedings should be published.

On Friday afternoon, M. Furnemont presided, and this being the last sitting the discussion was of a very miscellaneous character. A crowd of other matter prevented sufficient attention being given to the question of mutual aid in persecution. Several French delegates spoke in favor of the substitution of the Republican calendar for the Christian era, and for the institution of civil festivals to replace those of the church, and the substitution of commercial halls, schools, and museums in the place of churches.

The general council of the federation was reëlected, and its headquarters fixed at Brussels, as before. A committee residing at Paris was also appointed to supervise the publication of the report of the proceedings of the congress.

On the motion of Senor Maglia y Galvis, seconded by Senor Odou de Buen, a recommendation was addressed to the general council at Brussels that the next congress should be held at Madrid, where the delegates are promised a handsome reception.

The proceedings terminated, as they had begun, with short speeches from representativs of various nationalities.

VISITING THE MONUMENTS.

Those English delegates who went off from the Hotel de Ville without accompanying the others to see the statues, missed one of the most characteristic and distinctly French features of the proceedings. The delegates all wore the pansy, which in the French language of flowers signifies "la pensée" (thought), and which is adopted as the badge of Freethinkers in France, Belgium, Italy, and Spain. At each of the monuments—those of Dolet, Rousseau, Diderot, and Voltaire—we gathered round, uncovered, put some children (sometimes mere gamins looking on) in the center, and Citizens Schacre, Odin, and, at the statue of Voltaire, Dr. Voelkel, pronounced an oration of eulogium. These proceedings attracted a great deal of attention, and in each case a sergeant de ville came forward to learn the nature of the gathering and duly enter it in his notebook.

On the following day the most Socialistic among the delegates went to Père la Chaise to place a fine monumental wreath on the graves of those who fell during the Commune, and visited the new crematorium and the tombs of the many notables who were buried in that famous cemetery.

THE RECEPTION IN THE HOTEL DE VILLE.

While awaiting the convenience of the council we remained in the luxurious salon of the Hotel de Ville, which, with the single exception of the painted ceilings, which are not yet done, is fully as magnificent as in the days of the empire. Introduced into the municipal chamber, M. Joffrin, the vice-president, in the temporary absence of the president, said: "Ladies and gentlemen, we welcome you into this Hotel de Ville, where Liberty, and with her, Freethought, has sometimes been banished, but where liberty has so often been proclaimed that she has finished at last by triumphing. It is here that our precursors, making no difference of race or of people, received, at the time of the great revolution, the Freethinkers Anacharsis Cloots and the American Thomas Paine, both Frenchmen and foreigners having no other aim than the fraternization of all the peoples. The members of the municipal council of Paris are, in a very large majority, themselvs Freethinkers, and we believe with you, in the absolute necessity of ending with the religious idea which makes both slaves and masters. We especially applaud the efforts of foreign Freethinkers, since every Freethinker is naturally inclined to republicanism, and a friend of France." M. Joffrin desired that all foreigners should take away a pleasant souvenir of Paris, and of France and the republic, so often calumniated.

Dr. De Paepe returned thanks to the council. Paris, and France, he declared, had been apostles of humanity. He spoke of those who had come to the country of Voltaire from various parts of the world, and pointed to Mr. Truelove as among the early founders of Secularism. During Dr. De Paepe's speech, to which he gave a somewhat Socialist turn, M. Chautemps, the president of the municipal council, arrived and stood with the other councillors until Dr. De Paepe had finished.

Dr. Chautemps then, from the presidential chair, again welcomed us to Paris. He particularly addressed himself to the ladies, of whom there was a large number present, as having in their capacity of teachers of youth the future of Freethought in their hands. In bringing so many women to our ranks we had done the most precious work for the emancipation of the human spirit and the future of humanity. The present congress was particularly marked out as continuing the movement of emancipation begun in France in 1789. The revolution, it was necessary to feel, had indeed only commenced, and those who would complete it had to fight in every country against the same implacable adversary. The spirit of superstition was always and everywhere at the service of the party of reaction. By combating superstition you not only serve your own country but you hasten mutual understanding and fraternity among all the members of the human family.

Dr. Voelkel, on behalf of the foreign Freethinkers, said it was their mission to unite in a common bond all the children of the great family of humanity. M. Schacre spoke of the services of Paris to the cause of liberty, and Dr. Chautemps, in replying, said that the presence of so many delegates from abroad proved that Paris was not alone in taking strides in the domain of Freethought and liberty of conscience. He then invited the whole of the delegates to an adjoining salon to drink a toast to the future of Freethought. We noticed that the sentiment was done full justice to, in large glasses of champagne.

M. GUIMET'S MUSEE DES RELIGIONS.

One of the most interesting features of the English delegates' trip to Paris, was the visit paid, in common with the other delegates from various parts of the world, to the Museum of Religions founded by M. Guimet, of Lyons, and which he intends, as soon as all arrangements are complete, to throw open to the people of Paris and visitors to the gay metropolis.

It was gratifying, says Mr. Wheeler, for Freethinkers to be received by the Paris municipal council and to be welcomed and congratulated by the president of that council, and by one of its most influential members, M. Joffrin. It was still more gratifying to find that visitors to Paris hav placed before their eyes fine monuments erected to great Freethinkers like Dolet, Voltaire, Rousseau, Diderot, and Gambetta. Yet to students of religions who see how inevitable is the triumph of Freethought, when once Christianity is seen in its due place as but one of the many cults that hav engaged the faith and devotion of mankind, perhaps the most gratifying thing of all is the fact that there is at Paris a permanent institution which will serve as an object lesson of Freethought—a museum of religions, in which the growth, evolution, and decay of gods can be studied exactly as any other phenomena.

The Musée des Religions is a handsome building situated in the avenue de Jèna, not far from the Champ de Mars. We were received at the entrance by M. Emile Guimet in person, who accompanied us round and explained the most salient objects of interest. M. Guimet is not only a man of wealth, but of erudition; a wide traveler, full of the bonhomie which springs from sympathy with all sorts and conditions of men.

His explanation of the objects of interest with which his large museum abounds, was all that could be desired, and conveyed in a most genial form a deal of information, often bearing on the origin of Christianity. We took notes of many items of which we may hav something to say on a future occasion, but which space will not permit us to enter into at present. Suffice it to say M. Guimet has made a unique collection which will be a permanent source of instruction on the subject of comparativ religions.

THE BANQUET.

A goodly company of ladies and gentlemen sat down to the banquet on Friday evening at the Salons Bonvalet.

The chair was taken by M. Adolphe Deluc, of the Council General of the International Federation. M. Okecki acted as toast-master. After justice had been done to the repast, M. Deluc spoke of the fraternal nature of the gathering and proposed a toast, "The abolition of war." Mr. J. M. Robertson, in the name of the gentlemen of the press, presented a handsome bouquet to Mlle. Marie Veron, a charming young lady who acted as official reporter of the congress. A succession of toasts and speeches followed. In France, where the highest political posts are open to free competition, and where a great career is possible to the popular orator, it was no marvel to find a number of able and fluent speakers. The other countries having usually sent their orators, there was a continuous volley of rapid speeches, usually in French, but with a mingling of Spanish, Swedish, German, and other tongues. Mr. Foote spoke both in French and in English for the benefit of the English present, who longed to hear a little of their own language. He referred to the influence of English Freethinkers on Voltaire, and quoted the words of Paine, "The world is my country, and to do good is my religion." Mr. Wheeler also fired off a little speech in French, quoting the words of President Carnot, that "every man had two countries, his own and then France."

The centennial of the Revolution and the imminence of the French elections naturally gave a somewhat political cast to many of the speeches, and much was said of the hopes of foreigners for the maintenance of the republic and the fraternization of peoples.

M. Guimet, who was present, had his health drunk with great enthusiasm. The proceedings were protracted to a late hour, and when we left many were preparing to make it still later by joining in the mazy dance.

Resolutions on the Roman Church.

At a meeting of the Manhattan Liberal Club held at the German Masonic Hall, 220 East 15th street, in the city of New York, on Oct. 4, 1889, the following resolutions were duly adopted:

WHEREAS, The recent erection in the city of Rome, Italy, of a statue in commemoration of the martyrdom of the illustrious apostle of Freethought, Giordano Bruno, in that city on Feb. 17, 1600, has furnished the occasion for a frenzied shriek of anger on the part of the ecclesiastical authorities of the Roman Catholic church, inspired by the pope, and,

WHEREAS, In these addresses by the bishops the most audacious calumnies hav manifested an utter contempt for the progress of civilization, the freedom of the human mind, and the advancement of scientific discovery, and,

WHEREAS, The burning of Giordano Bruno at the stake by the Roman Catholic church was for the declaration of principles of astronomical truth—such as that the earth is not the center of the sidereal system—which are now the common property of all mankind, and are not disputed by any intelligent persons, not even by the authorities of the Roman Catholic church, and the murder of Bruno was, therefore, an act entirely indefensible upon any theory consistent with the progress of humanity, and is, therefore, shocking to any person whose conscience is not manacled by the shackles of the most wicked ecclesiastical tyranny the world has ever witnessed, therefore be it

Resolved, That these official utterances of the Roman Catholic authorities upon the occasion of the unveiling of the statue to the illustrious martyr to human progress, Giordano Bruno, furnish another striking proof that the Roman Catholic church is still the same brutal enemy of humanity and freedom which the pages of history show it has always been.

Resolved, That this occurrence toward the close of the nineteenth century is so shocking to the spirit of this age of enlightenment, that it should nerve every lover of humanity to renewed exertions to spread the gospel of individual thought among mankind, so that the time may be hastened when no man shall feel under obligation for his opinions to any other man or set of men; and further be it

Resolved, That the Manhattan Liberal Club of the city of New York congratulates the Liberals of Italy, and especially of the city of Rome, upon the successful inauguration of the monument to Giordano Bruno, which will ever stand in the streets of the imperial city as a perpetual reminder to the ecclesiastical authorities of the Roman Catholic church that the days of their dominion over the human intellect hav passed away forever, and that their sole remaining influence, political or religious, is among the vile, the ignorant, and the vicious of the nations most steeped in superstition, pauperism, and degradation.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to the daily journals of the city of New York and to the secretaries of the Liberal societies of America and Europe.

Injustice.

At Chambersburg, Pa., Benjamin Wilson, a colored man, has been sentenced by an alderman to imprisonment eighty-five days for swearing, one day for each oath. The law under which he was sentenced was passed April 22, 1794, and reads:

"If any person of the age of sixteen years or upward shall profanely curse or swear by the name of God, Christ Jesus, or the Holy Ghost, every person so offending, being thereof convicted, shall forfeit and pay the sum of sixty-seven cents for every such profane curse or oath; and in case he or she shall refuse or neglect to pay the said forfeiture, or goods or chattels cannot be found whereof to levy the same by distress, he or she shall be sent to the house of correction to serve one day for each oath."

This is wrong. If the man's swearing amounted to disorderly conduct, he should hav been tried on that charge and punished for that offense. Whether in his talk he used the names of pagan deities, or Mohammedan deities, or Christian deities, or any kind of deities, is a thing with which civil government has nothing to do. People say, "By Jove!" and there is no objection. Why is there no objection? Simply because the people that believed the Jove myth hav passed away. The god Jove is as alive now as ever he was. What right hav the authorities now to discriminate between Jove and Jehovah? Do they not know that when the people now punishing irreverent use of Jehovah's name hav passed away, Jehovah will be in the same position as Jove now? This tendency to exhume old Blue laws must be repressed.

Lectures and Meetings.

JOHN R. CHARLESWORTH, the young English lecturer living in this city, has changed his address to 505 East 83d street. Mr. Charlesworth is well liked by those who hav had the pleasure of attending his lectures, and societies within a few hundred miles of New York might do well to correspond with him.

W. F. JAMIESON and Rev. G. F. Devoe will hold a debate in Clarksville, Ia., for a week every evening, commencing Monday evening, October 21st, at 7 o'clock, on two propositions: 1. Jesus the Christ is the son of God. 2. Modern civilization is more indebted to skepticism and Infidelity than to the Christian religion. There will be music in the air. Address Mr. Jamieson at Clarksville, Ia.

THE Brooklyn Philosophical Association began its twelfth season on the 6th inst. with a lecture on Bruno. Next Sunday Prof. D. De Leon will speak on "Nationalism," to be followed on successiv Sundays by Mr. Z. S. Sampson on the French Revolution, and Mr. H. Powers on "Socialism Not Adapted to Our Times and People." These lectures are all followed by discussions. The Association meets at Fraternity rooms, Bedford avenue and South Second street, Brooklyn, E. D.

Science Wanted for Everything.

From the Melbourne, Aus., Liberator.

It seems to us that we sadly need a science of marriage in order to arrive at rational views on the subject. We need to do as has been done in language—gather up all known forms of marriage or sex relationships, ancient, modern, savage, barbarous, and so-called civilized. No case, no scrap of information should be neglected. These should all be carefully studied; and so should the results. And then we should be prepared to draw deductions from them of a purely and strictly scientific nature; and those deductions would be our most unerring guide in legislating upon marriage, divorce, etc.

Authenticity of the Bible.—Concluded.

Is it not surprising that among the multitude of ancient authors and ancient books written upon all subjects covering a period of about one thousand years before the advent of Jesus, not one of them mentions the Bible or refers to it in any way? If such a book, or even a part of it, had been in existence any time during the period, it certainly would hav been noticed by some writer. Nor is there a word about the God of this book, or is his name even mentioned.

The following quotations from a few of the most widely known authors that wrote about the first century A.D., are enough to convince any reasonable person that the Bible was not in existence at that time, or they certainly would hav mentioned it.

Pliny, a writer of hundreds of volumes on all subjects, was born A.D. 62, and died A.D. 116. He was a high official under the emperor Trajan. In his official capacity he wrote to the emperor that he had arrested some persons for professing Christianity. They affirmed that all their guilt or error was that they met on a certain day before it was light, and addressed themselvs in the form of a prayer to Christ as to some God, binding themselvs by a solemn oath never to commit any fraud, theft, or adultery, after which they would depart. Pliny says he could discover nothing more in this than an absurd and excessiv superstition. The church harps on this from Pliny and says it is corroborativ testimony of early Christianity, etc. It is not denied that Christianity existed at that time (about A.D. 100). It began about fifty years after the death of Christ by a few people forming themselvs into a society for benevolent purposes. These people belonged to the lower class and lived in Smyrna. This letter of Pliny's shows that excessiv superstition commenced early in the church. From a volume of Plutarch's, another writer of many works who wrote about the same time as Pliny, I quote the following preface:

Plutarch was born A.D. 40, and died A.D. 120, and resided at different periods at Rome, Athens, Delphi, and Alexandria. He wrote on all subjects of political, social, and religious interest. In all his numerous writings he has not left us the slighest trace of Christianity or the Christian religion. Nor is there any reason to think that Plutarch had any acquaintance with the Jewish scriptures. He shows a knowledge of the Jews and of some of their peculiar rites and opinions, and at the same time displays so much gross ignorance of their belief, religion, and history that it is impossible to believe that he could hav seen their sacred writings. He says in one place, however, that the Jewish abhorrence of swine amounted to veneration, and that the Jews worshiped this animal as their God.

This shows that at that day this nation was but little further advanced in civilization than the Indians of this country, and that their God and their sacred writing, if they had any, were no better known to the civilized nations that surrounded them than the great spirit and religious ceremonies of the Indians of the Western plains are to the people of this country today, or this great writer would not hav said, though possibly it might be true, that they worshiped the hog as their God.

Josephus, the Jewish historian, flourished about the same time as the other ancient authors I hav quoted from. As there were no schools among these tribes of wandering barbarians (the Jews), Josephus obtained his education at Rome, Athens, and other civilized cities. His writings bear all the earmarks of having been written from legends and traditions. The style and manner of the writings of Josephus and the five books of Moses are similar in almost every respect. Both commence new and important subjects in an abrupt and disjointed way; both leave important statements and histories in the same abrupt manner; both write of wonderful and unnatural occurrences that took place some four thousand years previous without telling where they get the information, without referring to any authority or giving any proof or even date. Josephus merely, in one or two instances, says something about the sacred writings of the Jews (not the Bible), but refers to no chapter, page, or the name of the writer. In one instance in particular, in his narrativ of the Israelites crossing the Red sea, he says the reader can use his own judgment about believing the story, or words to that effect, which shows he knew himself that he was not writing authenticated facts—simply legends. Josephus, like the Bible writers, as I said before, givs no reference and no proof of wonderful events related. He does not mention the Bible, which is proof positiv to any unprejudiced mind that it was not written at that day. If it was, it would be a difficult matter to decide whether the writings of Josephus were original or copied from the Old Testament, as they seem in many respects to be almost identical. As there is no positiv proof of the Bible being written before the time of Josephus, all that part of the book up to Job would appear to hav been founded upon the works of this author. The reasonable and rational conclusion then would be that Josephus wrote a history of the legends and traditions that had existed among the Jewish nation for about four thousand years, tracing their origin back to Adam and Eve, the first parents of this nation. And as they wanted to be entirely exclusiv (Jewlike) in their traditions, they originated in a miraculous way and knew no other nations or people only to plunder and rob them.

Then a reasonable history of the origin of Christianity would be that a part of the Bible was founded upon the works of Josephus. That Jesus instigated and preached a new religion assisted by twelve fishermen, afterward called the apostles or disciples; that after his death and the death of the apostles (which could not hav exceeded twenty-five years after the death of Jesus), this new religion languished for about twenty-five or fifty years. It was then revised by an association of persons in Smyrna who formed a society and adopted Christianity as their religion. After a century or so had elapsed this association adopted the Jewish Bible (which had been written in the mean time from works of Josephus) as the book of their religion. Then it became necessary to hav a life of Jesus and the apostles, which was written from tradition between the third and fourth centuries A.D. And in this New Testament the Old was made to appear to hav been written before the time of Jesus, and the events that had already occurred when the New Testament was written was made to fit into prophecies made in the Old with a dovetailed exactness.

That story of the version of the Bible called the Septuagint is disposed of by Chambers in this way: "The fact upon which this legend of the Septuagint rested is utterly rejected now as a piece of history. Its origin is shrouded in the greatest obscurity."

I challenge the pulpit to prove from the writings of ancient authors that wrote from 500 B.C. to the close of the first century A.D., the existence of the Old or New Testament, or the knowledge of the God they worship, excepting the legends and traditions written by Josephus, which seem to hav been the origin and basis of the Bible up to the book of Job.

The time of writing the New Testament, and who wrote it, are as uncertain and doubtful as of the Old. The very least reliable authority does not put it earlier than the second century, while many writers can find no authentic traces of its existence earlier than the fourth century.

I quote from a sermon delivered by Rev. Mr. Millstead, Chicago: "Paul must hav been largely gifted with the grace of God, for we must remember he had never seen Jesus, and he only knew his teachings by the word of mouth. The New Testament was not in existence at that time. Not a word of the gospel had yet been written." Paul ended his preaching about sixty-five years after the death of Christ; there was no New Testament at that time. Josephus wrote about one hundred years after Christ. Not a word did he say about the New Testament. Plutarch and Pliny wrote about the same time; not a word did they say about the New Testament. Consequently it was not in existence one hundred years after the death of Christ.

The time, then, in which the New Testament was written, like the Old, is not known with any degree of certainty. Referring again to Chambers's Encyclopedia, we find the following: "Among most critics the manuscript is not traced back further than the fourth century. The fathers of the church had but little or anything to say about the apostles. Their reticence in this respect was singular. In the second half of the second century distinct reference to the gospel is found, but none of these authors name the authors from whom they quote. There was great diversity of opinion on the authenticity of the New Testament. One of the church fathers doubted the authenticity of Hebrews, James, Jude, 2 Peter, and 2 and 3 John. Father Eusebius and Origen also doubted these books, and the Acts of Paul was almost universally rejected. Barnabas, and some other books, were considered absurd and heretical. The most probable supposition, then, is that the gospel sprang out of a common oral tradition."

About four hundred years after the events recorded in the gospel happened, according to this reliable authority, a history of them is written by no one knows who. For the men the pulpit say wrote them must hav been dead for centuries. Assuming—which is surely not unreasonable—that at the time of Christ the apostles were from twenty-five to fifty years of age, at the time Paul quit preaching, if any of them were alive, they would hav been from ninety to one hundred and fifteen years old. At the time of Josephus and the other ancient writers I hav quoted they would hav been from one hundred and twenty-eight to one hundred and fifty years of age. And at the shortest period of Chambers they would hav been from two hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and fifty years old. And at none of these periods was there reliable evidence of the New Testament being in existence.

It is generally conceded by the church that none of the apostles were alive thirty-three years after the death of Christ. It is supposed they all met their death from violence. A sensational preacher in New York, Talmage, says St. Matthew had his life dashed out with a halbert, St. Mark was dragged to death through the streets, and he mentioned several others that met death by violence. These facts are surely enough to convince any reasonable person that the length of time between the death of the apostles and the appearance of the New Testament was too great for them ever to hav written a word of it. But again, the Rev. George E. Merrill, in his history of the manuscripts, says, "That every one of the New Testament writings was destroyed at an early day, and what we hav are only copies. Not only hav the autographs of the New Testament scriptures been lost, but also the copies of them during the years of Christianity hav thus far eluded the most thorough search."

This reverend gentleman makes an assertion that there were originals of these copies without any proof whatever—merely says they were destroyed. Characteristic of the pulpit, isn't it? He says further that a library of ancient books was unearthed at Pompeii about 1770 A.D. These books were the only undoubted specimens of books contemporaneously with the writings of the apostles. These books were buried in the ruins of Pompeii A.D. 79." Not a remnant, copy, or fragment of the gospel was found among them." This is very good proof that these originals he talks of never existed, and the only gospels ever written are what were written about the fourth century or later. Thorne, another writer and standard authority in the church on this subject, after twisting and distorting, assuming and making assertions without any proof whatever, the very best he could do, left a gap of over one hundred years between the death of the apostles and the appearance of the New Testament. This makes it certain that none of the apostles ever wrote a word of them, any more than Jesus Christ did.

I suppose it would be unreasonable to expect this God to write, as the other did not. But while he was masquerading on earth as a child, a boy, a carpenter, and a man, a few words written by his own hand would hav been gratefully received by a fallen world. If this being was a man, the votes of men could not make him a God. Neither could they make him a man if he actually was a God. Therefore the Council of Nicea, that decided the divinity of Christ by a majority vote, simply assumed the impious authority to adjust questions that belong only to deity.

Gibbon spoke truthfully when he said: "The prerogativs of the king of heaven were settled, changed, or modified by kings on earth."

Then the best evidence and authority attainable shows these gospels were written about the fourth century, and originated from common oral tradition. How else could they originate when they were written four hundred years after the death of Christ and at least three hundred and fifty after the death of the apostles? And even after these books were written from hearsay and tradition, they were in the hands of unknown men to put in interpolations and changes to fit prophecies of events that had already occurred, for over twelve hundred years before they were printed.

In the history of the church, religion, and the Bible, where everything should be beyond the shadow of a doubt, where there should be no room for skepticism, where the basis should be as solid as a rock, we hav instead uncertainties, vague and shadowy statements, unreliable histories, anonymous authors, and wild and visionary prophecies. The church itself furnishes the proof of these statements in her many creeds, sects, and denominations; in her schisms, disputes, and disagreements; in the innumerable councils that hav been called to settle disputed dogmas that had existed ever since the Christian era, and in the repeated revisions of the Bible. On account of these dissensions and quarrels, trouble is continually arising in the church. Disputes hav been up ever since Christianity began, and will continue. Like Banquo's ghost, they won't down.

Cowardice of Public Men.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Considerable discussion has been had, and yet very much more remains to be said, upon the live question of universal taxation. That the property of certain societies is exempt from paying just taxes is to me inexplicably absurd, to say the least.

During the session of the twelfth legislativ assembly of the territory of Arizona the writer was a member of the lower house, and at that session introduced a measure providing for the assessment and collection of taxes upon all church property in this territory. I proved to the complete satisfaction of the house that the Roman Catholic church at the city of Tucson owned a large property which that institution annually rented to parties to be used as saloons and for other business, and upon which no taxes were ever paid, simply and solely because the property belonged to the church of Rome. The measure passed the house, but unfortunately it was killed in the upper branch of the legislature. Certain members of the upper house, in explaining to me why they opposed the measure, said: "The proposition to tax this class of property is undoubtedly just and proper, but the time is not propitious, and it is ahead of the times." In other words, they lacked the courage of their conscientious convictions, and consequently they voted to kill the measure. In this age of hypocritical toadyism, it requires considerable moral courage to advocate such a radical measure in the legislativ halls of either nation, state, or territory. Notwithstanding the tribe of sycophants, I firmly believe that such legislation must inevitably come sooner or later, and I for one shall at all times and places vote for and advocate the enactment of such a law, as one being truly and honestly fair to all the people.

I cannot see any good reason why millions upon millions of the world's wealth should be uselessly tied up in unproductiv non-taxpaying property. I sincerely hope to see the day, and that too in the near future, when every and all such properties are converted into public schools a d colleges, and only thereby rightly and justly exempt from the taxgatherer; but, until that time shall come, let all church properties pay their just proportion of taxes toward the support of the government which givs to them its protection. The Second Chapter of Matthew.

This chapter is unique both in style and matter, and it is doubtful if in the whole realm of religious literature there can be found a greater mass of inconsistencies and contradictions crammed together in such a short space. A careful and candid reader is forced to the conclusion that this portion of "holy writ" is a labored attempt to identify a person called Jesus with a vague and intangible personality whom enthusiastic Hebrews were constantly speaking of and fondly hoping would arise and permanently establish "the throne of David." The work, however, has been miserably done, and the trick of the whole scheme is too transparent to deceive anybody but prejudiced and unwary persons.

The chapter is short, but the events narrated are prodigious. The lovers of the marvelous may here be satisfied, and the most imaginativ of men will find their highest flights far transcended. Passing over the interesting spectacle of certain "wise men" from the east pursuing a star (shining, no doubt, during the day as well as the night) and the ordinary and commonplace facts connected with the various excursions of the "angel of the Lord," it will be interesting to examin briefly the so-called prophecies and their alleged fulfillment. This work has been ably performed by many "Infidels," but as Christians are never tired of calling attention to the numerous proofs of the infallibility of the scripture, it becomes the duty of Liberals to state and restate the grounds of their objections until men and women indignantly reject the whole scheme of Christian Theism.

Four prophecies are said to be fulfilled in this one chapter. The first has reference to the place where Jesus should be born (verse 6): "And thou Bethlehem, in the land of Judea, art not the least among the princes of Juda; for out of thee shall come a governor, that shall rule my people Israel."

Micah, one of the minor prophets, is supposed to hav uttered this prophecy. It is very evident, however, that if Micah referred to anybody at all it was a military gentleman, for in Micah v, 5, 6, he speaks of wasting the land, treading palaces, and delivering the Israelites from the Assyrian when he cometh into their land, and when he treadeth within their borders. Admitting for the moment that Micah v, 2, is a prophecy, can it be said with any degree of truth that Christ answers, in any one particular, the description of Micah's governor? Was Christ a governor?

Did he rule "my people Israel?" The two persons hav nothing in common save the fact of their being born in "Bethlehem of Judea." If this be all, then the prophecy would apply, with equal force, to any other child born in Bethlehem.

The second prophecy is mentioned in the fifteenth verse, "Out of Egypt hav I called my son." The flight of Joseph and Mary, with "their infant child Jesus," suggests many interesting ideas, and givs strong support to the theory that Jesus was born of Egyptian parents, and that Christianity is only a modification of the more ancient religions. Now this calling of "my son out of Egypt" is only mentioned by Hosea xi, 1 (another minor singer of Israel), and is clearly retrospectiv and not prophetic. The second and third verses of Hosea xi are meaningless if verse i refers to Christ. "As they called them so they went from them: they sacrificed unto Baalim and burnt incense to graven images. I taught Ephraim also to go, taking them by their arms, but they knew not that I healed them." It is difficult to imagin how even a religion maker could expect to palm off such a barefaced fabrication as a proof of the divine origin of his scheme.

The third prophecy is given in verse 18: "In Rama was there a voice heard, lamentation and weeping and great mourning, Rachel weeping for her children and would not be comforted because they are not." Words very similar to these may be found in Jer. xxxi, 15, but they cannot be regarded as prophetic. What is more common than to see parents mourn the death of their children? Jeremiah does not say that Herod would put to death all the children under two years old. The main feature is not mentioned, and, what is still more amusing, the very thing which everybody could say, is regarded as a marvelous instance of divine wisdom and foresight. The verse under consideration is merely a quotation.

In reading this thirty-first chapter of Jeremiah it is impossible to see what connection the assumed prophetic verse has with the other parts of the chapter. The chapter itself is not a regularly connected story, but an ingenious collection of "Thus saith the Lords."

The fourth and last prophecy is stated in verse 23: "And he came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth, that it might be fulfilled which was spoken by the prophets, he shall be called a Nazarene."

If Matthew is to be believed, his prophecy was fulfilled by the disobedience of Joseph. The Lord appeared unto Joseph in a dream, and told him that he might return into the land of Israel, as those who sought the young child's life were dead. Joseph departed for the land of Israel, but during his journey he heard that Archelaus did reign in Judea in the place of his father, so he turned aside into the parts of Galilee, "notwithstanding being warned of God in a dream." Thus it is clear that Jesus became a Nazarene because Joseph fancied he knew better than God where he might find a safe asylum for his child. But where are the words "spoken by the prophet" to be found, and what do they mean when read by themselvs? In Judges xiii, 5, it is written: "For the child shall be called a Nazarite unto God from his birth." Now, was Jesus a Nazarite from his birth? He was born in Bethlehem, so says verse 6 of Matthew ii, and only managed to get to Nazareth by a mere accident of circumstances. The story told in Judges is too ridiculous to be true, but the Nazarite mentioned in verse 5 is certainly Samson, for "no razor shall come on his head." And, as a sort of fulfillment of the fifth verse, the chapter closes with these words: "And the woman bare a son and called his name Samson. And the child grew and the Lord blessed him. And the spirit of the Lord began to move him at times in the camp of Dan between Zorah Eshtaol."

Thus are prophecies fulfilled, religions founded, myths perpetuated, and the minds of men enslaved throughout the ages. HENRY ROWLEY.

The Dwellers in the Tenements.

In my last letter upon the "Destruction of the Poor by Poverty," I asserted that it was impossible that the children born in the tenement-houses of New York, could do otherwise than suffer in consequence of the incessant exertion and the narrow circumstances of their parents. The injuries which occur prior to the birth of these children, however, are unhappily not the only thing from which they suffer; for as the same causes continue in force, the injury likewise continues. In those locations, for instance, the child has no room for play, and none of the privileges required for healthful exercise, but is restricted in every way. In order to modify to some extent these bad effects, charitable people hav established the fresh air fund for the purpose of furnishing country excursions for these unfortunates, but alas! the poor children hav to be brought back to the same wretched homes again. According to my view, the best thing accomplished by the undertaking is, that such an excursion will necessarily make the children dissatisfied with their condition and desirous of obtaining something better. Contentment with things as they are is the curse of the world, and is equivalent to a species of fatalism.

The questions which men who rent houses of the sort referred to, are obliged to ask of themselvs, are not whether the places are such as they would like to liv in, or whether the neighbors among whom they will be thrown, are agreeable or disagreeable, but whether the places are such as they can endure to liv in and will be able to pay the rent for. If sickness overtakes them or employment fails, they are in a bad state indeed. Their condition may well be compared to that of persons living in the vicinity of a volcano, or standing on the brink of a precipice from which they may at any time be hurled. The important question presents itself, Is it right, proper, or necessary that at this stage of the world's history, with all the improvements in existence, human beings should liv in such a condition?

In an essay of Mr. Ruskin's which I read long ago, he said, among other things, addressing just such people as those described: "Claim your crumbs from the table if you will, but claim them as men not as dogs; but claim rather your right to be holy, perfect, and pure."

Suppose that any of the men now prominent in the world of reform should call together all those dwellers in the 32,390 tenements referred to, and ask them why they did not put forth the claims mentioned by Mr. Ruskin. The poor creatures, so long voiceless, would be likely to ask advice as to the grounds on which they should base their claims. The grounds would be that at the foundation of this government it was declared as a fundamental principle of the government that all men were created free and equal, with the same rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that the government was of the people, by the people, and for the people. They, being a portion of the people, were therefore justified in demanding these inborn rights which they did not then possess. They might add, furthermore, that they were daily in the pursuit of happiness, but that in their case the attempt to reach it was worse than following a will-o'-the-wisp, because the long hours they were obliged to work, when they had work, and the continuous uncertainty as to how long the employment might last, would prevent them from enjoying the comforts of a home, even if the rookeries they were compelled to occupy were worth calling homes. Moreover, the low position they held in the society of which they formed a part prevented them from having any influence with the men who had been hired to make the laws by which their condition was to be improved or made worse.

I think no man could interview those people and examin the places in which they liv and their modes of living without coming to the conclusion that the fact that so many of them remain decent, industrious, and honest, is proof positiv of the falsity of the theological doctrin of original sin, and shows furthermore that if natural opportunities were opened to those who perform the labor, this world would soon be better and more beautiful than any heaven that was ever pictured either by mythology or theology. In this happy event the survival of the fittest, so far as human beings are concerned, would cease to be a question; for if the wealth which is produced by those who labor were distributed with any sense of justice or fairness, we should soon cease to hear of either millionaires or paupers, as they hold to each other the relation of cause to effect. And if the cause were done away with, the effect would naturally cease. RUTH BRETTELL.

A National Religion.

From the American Hebrew.

Judaism is not more alien to Catholicism or any of the branches of Protestantism than are these to one another. If the majority succeeded in stamping the United States officially as a Christian country, would the majority of the Christians be satisfied until it were labeled a Protestant Christian country? And when that had been accomplished, none of the principal branches of Protestantism would rest content until it had been decided whether it should be a Protestant Episcopal Christian country, a Congregationalist Christian country, or a Methodist Episcopal Christian country.

This is not the whole difficulty, however. Even if some satisfactory arrangement could be effected as to the association of Christianity with the national government, the real danger would present itself when the same principle is logically applied to local government. Here we would hav to face the worst menace to our republican institutions.

If the Protestant majority is to dominate our national affairs, what is to prevent the Catholics laying hold of the administration of affairs in those municipalities where they are in the majority? It needs no elaboration to form a conception of the terrible results that await us if such a condition of things should ever come to pass.

The only safeguard against such a consummation that is to be devoutly deplored, lies in the absolute and unconditional alienation of the state from any sectarian association. This is what the founders of our country had in view when they embodied in the Constitution the provision that "Congress should make no law respecting an establishment of religion."

The only functions of government in this country, its states and cities, are legislativ, administrativ, and judicial. None of these require for their exercise any association with religious bodies. Those that are engaged in them may be—nay, should be—animated by religious impulses. This, however, only implies their individual affiliation with religious bodies, and does not at all necessitate any such relationship between the church and the state.

THREE priests hav been arrested in the state of Guanajuato for preaching sedition. They wish to overthrow the government because it will not let them run it. Thus it is everywhere, priests making trouble for the government.

A PHYSICIAN in Chicago is quoted as saying in a speech: "If they are going to close the saloons, we insist that the churches shall be closed on Sunday." A paper remarks that "this is certainly a new idea." A new idea, because the superstitious masses hav always footlicked the churchmen and allowed them to claim whatever monstrously unfair immunities they pleased. It is nevertheless a just idea. It is so clearly and manifestly just, and anything else is so clearly and manifestly unjust, that only the veriest extreme of beguilement and delusion could hav kept the people from bringing it up before now. Nothing could be clearer than that it is the only fair arrangement, and it is one that must put into practice right away. Equal privileges to all, is the American idea, and we must carry it out. We Secularists intend that it shall not be half so new ten years from now as it is now.

The Clergy.

The picture which Mr. Heston furnishes for the first page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER is a strong one. Possibly some will consider the words attributed to the clergy as too strong, and not exactly in accord with fact; but this opinion is erroneous, and we hav but to reflect a moment to find that Mr. Heston has only bluntly stated truths which the progressiv world knows absolutely, and which the unprogressiv or Christian world would be the better for knowing.

Jesus Christ called the priests of his time liars, ravening wolves, blind leaders, whited sepulchers, children of the devil, and other names more forcible, and probably true, than polite. All of the clergy of the present day are not as bad as those of Christ's time, but the orthodox portion of them hav undoubtedly been guilty of all the conduct charged to them in our cartoon. They hav poohpoohed the discoveries of science, denied its conclusions, and anathematized its investigators. Astronomy, chemistry, medicin, geology, political economy, evolution, and even geography, the simplest elementary doctrin of the earth's shape and surface, hav all been opposed by the clergy, their students denounced as Infidels—which most of them were—and damned to fire in this world whether God followed the example in the next or not. Reason the Romish church has never wanted, and all argument against her doctrins has been promptly suppressed wherever she has had the power. It is not a month since the archbishop of the largest Catholic diocese in this country, in following the pope's lead in fulminating against the builders of the Bruno statue, devoted a lengthy part of his address to showing that reason is an insecure dependence and a bad thing to cultivate. And it is not over two months ago that another Romish archbishop forced a Catholic editor to retract opinions which were opposed to his own. The Protestant clergy pretend to favor reason, but their practice of this theory ends when a man has been made a Protestant. They hav no use for reason after that.

In this country the pulpit is certainly the refuge of the intellectually timid. In it a minister will say about a man what he would not dare to utter on the street. Who does not know of innumerable cases where a clergyman, taking advantage of the superstitious regard for his office which makes him a privileged character, has preached at individual neighbors, or at a class, abusing them personally, belying their sentiments, slandering their characters, and insulting the better sense of the whole community by an unreasonable diatribe? They hav protected themselvs by law, for if a man should throw their lies and insinuations back in their faces, he is, forsooth, arrested under special laws protecting "religious worship." The policeman's club is at the service of the clergy to protect them from possible unpleasant consequences of their arrogant assumption of superiority, and no man dares to defend his character before the same congregation which hears the minister's attack upon it. In the colonial days of our country the minister was also the magistrate, the big man of the community, and he never hesitated to use his temporal power to enforce his spiritual pretensions. In those days, as in Catholic countries now, the people did literally cringe and grovel before the mighty man of God. And if the Sabbath Union, the God-in-the-Constitution party, and the Women's Christian Temperance Union obtain the national and state legislation they are so pertinaciously seeking, the clergy will be to a great extent reinstated in power, and woe betide those who disobey their mandates.

The reason of and fault of this spiritual tyranny lies not so much with the individuals composing the clerical class as with the people who hav made the system and subscribed themselvs its devoted slaves. Many of them liv all their lives unconscious of their bondage. They never stop and ask themselvs why they should submit to a minister, believing his every word and ascribing to him a wisdom, virtue, and character they would certainly not giv to any other human being without careful investigation. They go it blind on the preacher, as though a license to preach removed all fallibility and liability to lapse from virtue and honesty, and made of its holder a being almost "divine." No followers are quite so abject in their slavery as those who voluntarily renounce their own womanhood and manhood and depend on some one else to furnish them with brains. This has been the evil resulting from the inculcation of Christianity. It has given us a class of priests to take advantage of the people, and made the people only too willing to be taken advantage of. The clergy are, perhaps, as sincere in their belief that they are doing a good work as kings are in maintaining their own possession of divine right. It remains, therefore, for those who see the iniquitous monstrosity of the clerical system—the evils resulting from a sincere or designing tyranny and the unconscious submission thereto—to rouse the people with tongue and pen and pencil from their slavish lethargy.

The Secular Union Congress.

Intending visitors and delegates to the Secular Union Congress at Philadelphia on the 25th, 26th, and 27th of this month will do wall to cut President Westbrook's communication out as a guide to the hall and hotel. No doubt they will adopt his suggestion as to making one hotel a headquarters for the gathered clans.

We hope that the Congress will be numerously attended, even though no great amount of noise has been made about it, owing to the retirement of its hustling secretary. There never was a time when concerted and organized action by the Freethinkers was more imperativly demanded. The National Reform Association is extraordinarily activ, and owing to the mistake of the New Hampshire legislature in sending Blair to the national senate; the selection of a rigid Presbyterian, who will favor the church in all possible ways, as president, and the elevation of Philadelphia's Holy John to a cabinet position where he can by his Sunday fanaticism inconvenience hundreds of thousands of people, the Christian effort to make the people subservient to the church is bearing practical fruit. Aside from this, the war in the four new states is by no means ended. We hav not yet obtained copies of the constitutions adopted by Washington, the two Dakotas, and Montana, but it is very certain that many of the questions relevant to the Nine Demands hav been left to the legislatures just elected. There is enough practical and hopeful work for the Union there to tax the best energies of the best board of directors that can be chosen. We certainly trust that the Union will put itself in communication with the leading men and Freethinkers of these states with the idea of preventing the Christianizing of their laws. An ounce of this prevention will be worth a ton of expostulation when the mischief shall hav been done. By petitions, individual appeals to lawmakers, and speeches before legislativ committees, the enactment of laws can be stopped when twice the effort could not secure their repeal if once put on the statute books. There is, too, the suit in Chicago against the St. Mary's Training School and the commissioners of Cook county to restrain them from using public funds to support the school, which is but a nursery for Roman Catholicism, and affords a glaring example in its use of public funds of how constitutions are violated in the interests of the various sects of the dominant religion. The appellate court has refused to decide the case on the ground that as a constitutional question is involved it must be taken to the supreme court. The issue is plain between the practice of the Cook county commissioners of giving money to the school and the Illinois constitution, which the greatest of Freethinkers helped to frame; and the defendant school has admitted by its demurrer all the facts alleged by the plaintiffs. The Secular Union should certainly push this suit to victory, for it means much to the great state of Illinois, and as an example for the rest of the country.

The project of a Manual of Ethics has been pushed successfully so far; the money for the prize is on hand, and the matter is in charge of a competent person. Perhaps before another Congress the manuscript will be in the hands of the committee. It is a royal prize, and many thinkers will no doubt strive to earn it. We shall then possess a scientific method of teaching our children morality without the religious encumbrance which the present writers on the subject hav not been ingenuous enough to avoid.

It will be seen, therefore, that there is abundance of labor ahead of Freethinkers if they will but assume the burden. Every Freethinker in the country who can should be at Philadelphia on the 25th instant. There will be a plenty of speeches, and good ones; a plenty of opportunity to meet old friends and make new ones; and the routine business will no doubt be lively, as several individuals are anxiously endeavoring to grasp the vacant secretaryship. Personal ambition, however, must be kept in abeyance and subordination to the work demanded of the Liberals of the country, or the Union's power for good will be gone.

Go to the Congress, one and all!

New Mexico.

We hav most excellent news to report from this state, or coming state. Secular schools hav triumphed there. The state contains many men of sound and acute minds, and they hav done nobly. The opposition from the Romanists was unexpectedly feeble. The priests found it impossible to rouse their followers into efficient action. Their followers seem to be getting sick of them just as the followers of the priests in Mexico and Italy are getting sick of their once loved leaders there.

Before the education article came up Archbishop Salpointe, of Santa Fe, published a letter denouncing the public schools. Ex-Gov. S. B. Axtell replied as follows:

"The state has no right to provide for religious institutions, however strong the argument may be that religion is absolutely indispensable to the welfare of the people. The state can neither provide for its teaching nor its support. The fact that a very large majority of the people of this territory are Catholics ought not to hav any weight in the settlement of the question of common schools. The right of every individual to worship or not to worship must be left to the dictates of his own conscience, not to the opinions of a majority of his neighbors. I do not know that anybody seriously disputes the rights of even an ignorant and bigoted parent to shape the religious convictions of his child, but I do most seriously and earnestly dispute the right of the state to interfere by any system of religious schools. . . . The letter, while ostensibly written to instruct the constitutional convention, is mainly directed against the American system of education. It eulogizes Canada, and several European countries, but has not one word of commendation for the great, liberal, progressiv, and intelligent people of the United States. Why can Canada be favorably compared to the United States? Is there any European country where the condition of all the people is so favorable to the pursuits of life, liberty, and happiness? Non-sectarian schools will never stand in the way of religious instructions either in the family, the Sabbath-school, or the church, but in the interest of harmony, of intelligence, and of progress, do not attempt to teach the dogmas or tenets of any church in the common schools."

The educational article was adopted by the constitutional convention. It provides for the establishment and maintenance of a uniform system of public schools, which shall be open to and sufficient for the education of all the children in the state, and shall be under the absolute control of the state and free from sectarian or church control, and no other or different schools shall ever receive any aid or support from public funds. No sectarian tenet, creed, or church doctrin shall be taught in the public schools. No part of such funds, or of any other fund created or authorized by law for educational purposes shall ever be applied toward the maintenance, support, or aid of any school or other institution in the management of which any religious or other sect has any part, or which is not under the absolute control of the state.

The provisions of this and the preceding section are declared to be irrevocable without the consent of Congress and the people of the state.

Ample provision is made for raising funds which shall be used for common school purposes throughout the state in proportion to the number of children of school age.

The article also sets forth that provisions shall be made by law for teaching the principles of the constitutions of the United States and the state in the common schools. No religious tests shall ever be required of any person as condition of admission into any public educational institution of the state either as teacher or student, and no teacher or student of any such institution shall ever be required to attend or participate in any religious service whatever.

It was decided to first submit the proposed constitution to Congress, and if that body should pass an enabling act, then the constitution is to be voted upon by the people within ninety days thereafter, but should Congress refuse to act, then the constitution is to be voted upon at the next general election for delegates in Congress. The convention memorialized Congress for an extra grant of public domain for school purposes, and appointed a committee of one from each county to prepare an address to the people, and also one to Congress urging upon them the necessity for the admission of New Mexico as a state.

Faith Cure.

We will describe another death among the many unceasingly being caused by the Christian religion.

Anna McKee, one of the prettiest young ladies of Cape Vincent, New York, was employed as dressmaker in Redpath's establishment in New York city. A few weeks ago she left this city to visit friends. While in Cape Vincent she stopped at the residence of Emma Ingalls, a spinster, who thinks she has been cured of innumerable ills through the medium of one Mrs. A. J. McConnell, who is chief among a small band of Christian scientists. A few days ago Miss McKee was taken ill with gastritis. Mrs. McConnell and Miss Ingalls took full charge of her case. They did not send for a physician, but told the girl that God would be angry with her if she distrusted him to that extent. They advised her that if she kept right on trusting and praying she would get well. Miss McKee did not believe in Christian science, but she was powerless. When at last she lay in the most terrible agony, the only comfort or help she got was an exhortation to be faithful and pray. Three days before Miss McKee's death Miss Libbie Iselin and Mrs. E. Stala heard how ill she was, and went to the house. They were denied admittance by Miss Ingalls, but pushed the spinster aside and reached the sick girl's bedside. They sent for Dr. Masson, but when the physician arrived he was unable to do anything to save the girl's life. Miss McKee died next day. The physician believes that if he had been called in time he could hav saved her life. The people of the town are very indignant over the affair.

If the people of the town who are indignant over the affair would like to hav such practices stopped, we will inform them that the only way to do so is to throw away that book that they keep in town and think is divine truth. If that book teaches anything at all, it teaches faith cure. If it does not teach faith cure, it does not teach anything.

The practice of faith cure is a practice that waxes and wanes precisely in proportion as belief in Christianity waxes and wanes. When one increased, the other increased; when one was at its hight, the other was at its hight; now that one is declining, the other is declining. Whenever and wherever Christianity becomes strongly believed, then and there faith cure must necessarily rise into prevalence.

There are several other things that follow Christianity's rises and falls in just the same way. Witchburning, torture of dissenters, antagonism to science, suppression of free thinking, and faith cure—these things we may conveniently take all together as uniformly and with mathematical exactness attending Christianity's power and disappearing with its disappearance. If we ever allow Christianity to reacquire its former influence, witchburning, torture of dissenters, antagonism to science, suppression of free th nking, and faith cure must inevitably reacquire their former influence.

"Faith cure is the most dangerous form of modern quackery."

So says the World. We would rather put the sentiment in this way: The Christian religion is the most dangerous of all forms of quackery either ancient or modern.

The Persecuted Spiritualists.

The trial of Dr. W. E. Reid, of Grand Rapids, Mich., for differing with Postmaster-general Wanamaker in belief as to our state after death, comes off this month. We continue, as we started, to feel sympathy for the persecuted Spiritualists, to brand the arrest as an act of despotism that no American should stand by and witness, and to solicit to it the attention of Liberals of every shade of belief.

Dr. Reid has made the rounds of all the Spiritualist camp-meetings, including such well-known resorts as Lake Pleasant, Onset, Niantic, Parkland, Queen City Park, Ætna, Sunapie Lake, Cassadaga, Vicksburg, Haslett Park, and others. At each of these places he spoke, describing his sufferings at the hands of John Wanamaker, and always called forth a resolution denouncing the man who runs the mails in the interests of the Christian trust in religious belief. He has succeeded in raising a robust defense fund for use in employing eminent counsel. The Spiritualists speak of the prosecution as a step toward a theocratic government, an effort to put God in the Constitution. If, they say, there is to be any religion in the immortal document, they prefer not to take it from Philadelphia. They say they can rouse a feeling that may compel the removal of the postmaster who knows all about the next life and knows just which party should be licensed to sell information about it. It is certain that signs of such a feeling are appearing. The New York World says:

"We are inclined to agree with Dr. Reid in his opinion that individual liberty has been attacked in his person. The doctor may be a fool, but if so he has an unalienable right to be so, and if his clients choose to pay him for the exercise of a skill which he does not possess, the case is no worse than that of people who pay quack doctors who profess ability to cure consumption, corns, epilepsy, bad breath, sciatica, freckles, and the like. Within limits every American citizen has a right to be cheated out of his money, just as he has an unquestionable right to be a crank or to believe that two and two make thirteen. If Dr. Reid's offense consists only in the untruth of his beliefs with respect to his converse with the spirit world, his arrest is an outrage, inasmuch as there is nobody in this country authorized to decide what beliefs respecting spiritual things are true and what untrue."

Prof. Jos. Rodes Buchanan, editor of the Journal of Man, recently expressed himself on the matter to a newspaper correspondent in language so sensible that we will quote it:

"I believed we were living in a republic," he says, "but since his Calvinistic majesty, John Wanamaker, issued his last edict against the freedom of the pen, in his prosecution of Dr. Reid, I think it is a debatable question. Solon's definition of a republic was a community in which an injury to the humblest citizen was felt by the whole community. Dr. Reid has done what others hav done and what we would all do if we could, and if he is condemned then we are all condemned for the new crime of holding intercourse with the angel world. It is a crime because John Wanamaker says it cannot be done! And this is the principle of the prosecution, if it has any principle, that whenever the great postmaster-general does not believe in anything he can order the prosecution of those who do believe and who do the thing that he condemns. The Reid case is a test case to see if Spiritualism cannot be put down by law whenever Spiritualists make use of the post-office. If the principle is sustained it is the most gigantic usurpation that has been attempted since the federal government was formed and would giv our national postmaster the powers in some respects of a Russian despot. Spiritual papers do the same thing for which he is prosecuting Dr. Reid—they send out communications from spirits through the post-office and are paid for it, and if he is right in his new usurpation it is his right and duty to punish the editors and suppress the papers by excluding them from the post-office, and the best thing that editors and homeopathic doctors could do would be to hav a private conference with our master John and find out what he believes in and what he will permit, for on this new principle he is dangerous to all men whose brains are activ enough to originate anything that Postmaster John does not understand."

Catholics Conquer.

A fight between Protestants and Catholics has been going on in the province of Manitoba. It has resulted in the victory of the Catholics. It was decided that this sect should hav separate public schools. It was also decided that the French language should be recognized equally with the English. As there are not more than ten per cent of French-speaking people there, and an equal number of German, there is no reason why the German language should not be given equal privilege with the French. These things always follow in every place where Catholics obtain a majority, or even a minority sufficient to hold the balance of power. In Canada the constitution allows the endowment of religious orders from the public funds; the right of the church to exact tithes and other taxes; the right of Catholic bishops to create parishes which shall, ipso facto, be municipalities, and the right of the church to control the public schools. In every district in this republic in which Catholics become numerous, they secure everything of this sort that they can possibly grasp. By hook or crook they secure all the immunities, privileges, donations, offices, and perquisits that our city governments can possibly support. In lesser towns they do the same, and in addition are continually taking possession here and there of one after another of our public schools.

A Christian Error.

Mentioning the arrest by the order of "Holy John" Wanamaker of a Western medium for asserting that he obtains communications from the "other world," the Christian Statesman says:

"The Spiritualists are holding indignation meetings, and the Freethought journals are raising the cry of 'religious persecution' and 'invasion of natural rights,' as they did when D. M. Bennett was cast into jail for circulating obscene books through the mails."

We wish the Statesman would observe accuracy in its statements. A jury browbeaten by a furious prosecution and bigoted judge, allowed themselvs to be compelled to say that the book Mr. Bennett mailed was obscene. Several scores of other men, however, prominent and intelligent—men of national reputation like Charles Devens, then Attorney-General of the United States, O. B. Frothingham, Elizur Wright, Parker Pillsbury, and even Mr. Hayes himself, then president of the United States, said the book was not obscene. And the jury, according to the published statement of one of them, would never hav rendered such a verdict had they been left to construe the law. The Statesman should understand the case before allowing itself to slander a dead man. We trust it will hav the honesty to make the correction.

Editorial Notes.

A FAMIN prevails throughout Tigre, a province of Abyssinia. Bands of starving peasants are ravaging the country. It is odd, in view of the fact that Christianity produced civilization and its powers, that the countries where we hear of famins most are the eminently Christian ones of Ireland and Abyssinia.

"'WE are building our schools,' says the Catholic Review, 'which some day the state will support.' We hope so, as unsectarian free schools.—Independent."

Christians are building their churches, which they hope the state will continue to support. We hope so, as temples for instruction in science and morals, worship of the true and the good.

THE Personal Liberty League of Cincinnati continues its denunciation of the Sabbath laws. The Freise Pr. sse justifies the saloonkeepers in their original resolution to resist and defy the law. It says: "To oppose laws against liberty is not only the right, but the duty, of every thinking and liberal-minded man."

PROF. E. E. WHITE, superintendent of public schools of Cincinnati, spoke at the Women's Christian Temperance Union School of Methods at Bay View, the Michigan Chautauqua, this year, on the "Duty of the Hour." He spoke for the Blair bill, and said that there was but one vote against it in the one thousand at the recent national teachers' convention at Nashville. "The family, church, and state," said he, "should in a holy alliance gather about the cradle."

THE Episcopalians in council in this city hav been wrangling over the retention of the Nicene Creed in their faith, and the conservativ party hav won. The chief opposition was to one clause which asserts that the Holy Ghost proceeds from the son as well as the father. It was a typical church wrangle—grave and learned men discussing a most absurd subject without the thought once occurring to them that they were making themselvs ridiculous in arguing about something of which they knew and can know nothing. What does anybody know about a holy ghost, or a Christian deity, or its alleged son!

THE Lord must be on the warpath against the heretics about this time. Charles Watts has been down with a bad case of blood poisoning, and a Carthage paper of the 2d instant had this: "Watson Heston had an alarming attack of heart disease this morning and for a short time it was thought he could not survive. He grew easier, however, toward noon, and is resting comfortably this evening." We learn from Secular Thought, however, that Mr. Watts was rapidly improving and expected to lecture last Sunday, and Watson Heston writes on the 4th that he was able to sit up at that date, and Dr. Trenckler cheered him with the information that he would be all right in a few days. We hav a piece of sympathy as big as a barrel for both of these distinguished gentlemen, whose efforts for Freethought cannot be spared.

Letters from Friends.

PORT TOWNSEND, WASH., Sept. 15, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I hav just finished "Yone Santo: A Child of Japan." It is a fine story of Japanese life and customs, and exposes those superstitious missionary thieves. It ought to be read by all. We hav a good supply of gospel-shops in this little town, and they are still wasting good lumber for superstition and ignorance. Those that cannot raise money enough to build a new church and be up with the times are whining around like dogs with sore heads.

I am going to do my utmost to attend the great convention at Portland, Ore., on October 12th, 13th, and 14th. I think there will be a grand, successful time. I am glad to see Mr. C. B. Reynolds advocating it with such eloquent letters through the Liberal press. I wish Mr. Reynolds or some other eloquent lecturer would giv us a call and treat us with a course of lectures. I think we would hav no trouble in getting a suitable hall and meeting all expenses. There is a good Liberal element here, but they seem to be a little afraid of Mrs. Grundy. They need a good shaking up.

Hoping soon again to hav the mental treat of hearing a great exponent of the Nine Demands, I am,

Yours for Universal Mental Liberty, ARTHUR VENN.

SANTA FE, N. M., Sept. 19, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: Of course you know that I am a subscriber to your paper, with which I am greatly pleased. I am not agreed, however, with the course of our writers and lecturers in their violent attacks upon the Catholic church. They ought to know that all our laws of religious intolerance emanate from Protestant sources, and that the Protestants use the Catholic people merely as a catspaw to assist them in their schemes of religious oppression. Here in New Mexico we had no Sunday laws until the American Protestant came in. And certainly the Catholics do not send the Blairs and Comstocks to offices of public trust. To look also beyond our own country, we see how Catholic France and Italy are bravely coming to the front, and even poor despised Mexico boasts perhaps to-day of more religious freedom than our own country. The fact is, our people are fighting the Catholic church of two hundred years ago, and do not see that things hav taken a mighty change since that time. Let the Catholics alone. They mind their own business and do not bother us. That church cannot liv among educated people, and we cannot afford to waste our efforts in that direction while the Protestants are gradually taking away our personal liberty. LEWIS SCHORMOYER.

DAYTON, O., Sept. 28, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I inclose this extract from the report of the Mormon commission clipped from to-day's Dayton Journal:

The commission, in view of the present condition of the territory as regards polygamy, does not think that Utah should be admitted as a state. Should it be, the commission says: "It would not be long before the gentile element, with its advanced civilization, its trade and its traffic, would be driven from the territory and the Mormon theocracy be made supreme." In regard to prohibition of immigration the report says: "While we forbid the immigration of the non-proselyting, peace-loving, docil Chinese because we fear future danger from his coming; while we forbid the landing on our shores of contract laborers because they cheapen the wages of American-born citizens; and paupers because they become a burden, there is far greater reason for closing our doors as a nation and forbidding citizenship to hordes who are brought here to swell the ranks of an organized body which teaches them in advance to hate our government, denominates its executiv, lawmakers, judges, and prosecutors as persecutors, and instils into every mind the constant teaching that their pretended revelations are more binding than the highest and best laws of the land, and that resistance to such laws is virtue and rendering obedience to God."

It appears to me that the arguments used against admitting Mormon immigrants applied with tenfold force to the Roman Catholics, for what organized body teaches in its parochial schools to the children more treasonable doctrins than they do, by instilling into their minds that the pope and his priest's commands must be obeyed in preference to the laws of the land wherever they conflict, and resistance to such laws is virtue and rendering obedience to God? In my opinion parochial schools should be forbidden by law.

PURDY'S STATION, N. Y., Sept. 29, 289.

MR. EDITOR: In THE TRUTH SEEKER of September 28th Mr. Franklin Steiner proposes that a statue should be erected to Thomas Paine in Philadelphia, on the same spot where he toiled and labored for the independence of America. There can be no doubt that no man deserves our esteem and thanks more than Thomas Paine. There is no word in the human language greater than liberty, and consequently the greatest thing a man can do in the world is to work for liberty. Personally I do not think that a statue is of great consequence. In my opinion, the greatest monument that can be built to Paine is to continue his work, to defend the rights of men, to stand by everyone whose rights are trampled under the feet of the oppressor—in short, to labor for the happiness of mankind. To erect a statue to Paine and to be idle ourselvs would be a mockery. In this respect I share the opinion of Dobrolooboff, the second person in the trinity of the Russian critical literature (the other two are Belinsky and Pisareff). When Belinsky died in 1848 he left a host of admirers, who determined to celebrate annually the birthday of their great teacher, as they called Belinsky. These festivals were of the ordinary kind, with the usual speeches and toasts. Dobrolooboff used to take part in them, until he became dissatisfied with this mode of honoring the memory of Belinsky, when he asked indignantly: "Is this all that can be done? Do we advance the ideas of Belinsky by making a trivial speech on his birthday?" But so long as great men are honored with statues, surely Paine deserves one. Perhaps no man has ever done more for liberty than he did; no man ever was truer to his principles than he was. He was a man of whom the human race should be proud. His memory ought to be in the heart of every liberty-loving man and woman. But where are the people who will erect a statue to him? Should it be done by a handful of Freethinkers? The American people do not remember his great deeds; they do not appreciate his work for the independence they now enjoy. They despise him because he was honest, because he expressed his real thoughts on the subject of religion. It seems that the world can stand anything but truth told in plain language. Had Paine lived the life of a hypocrit, had he said that the Bible is the word of God and Jesus Christ is the savior of the world, how popular his name would hav been to-day! But he had courage enough to deny the authority of the Bible, and for this reason he is denounced as a monster. How long will it be so? Will the masses never become elevated? Will superstition drag its victims forever? Will intellectual honesty forever be considered a disgrace?

Let us hope that this order of things will change. The people will come to the conclusion that a man ought not to be slandered for being honest, and then they will honor Paine as one of the greatest benefactors of the human race. But when will this dream be realized? It may happen in the far future. We shall not see this blessed time, but we should not despair. The stars are far away from us, but still they are stars. Meanwhile, let us do our best to hasten the time when no chains will disfigure the bodies or minds of men, and if it is possible to erect a monument to Paine, let it be done. Let us honor ourselvs by honoring him.

CLEMENS P. BERYLSON.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., Sept. 22, 289.

MR. EDITOR: Civilization does not brutalize. It is opposed to brutality in all its forms of manifestation. When it is said that man has become civilized in spite of Christianity, may it not with equal truth be said that man gets well in spite of medicin? Do not both statements indicate too much generalization, and, therefore, are they not misleading, not to say untrue?

Suppose we say man has become civilized in spite of the Christianity taught by some men calling themselvs Christians, and men get well in spite of medicin prescribed by some men calling themselvs doctors. Quacks are found in other professions than the medical, and butchers almost everywhere.

When our brother Peck gets "on the warpath" it is hardly necessary for him to label his picture. The "blood in his eye" is so very apparent it is no wonder that "the blighting influences of Christianity" are the only kind observable. He raves as though, had he every Christian neck in a halter, he holding the other end, the only reason he would not pull it and strangle them all, would be lack of the necessary strength.

Men who think will not lose sight of the fact that to accomplish desired results brutal natures most naturally resort to brutal measures, which humane men most naturally do not.

The parent beholding the sufferings of a beloved child whose leg it is necessary to amputate, has his choice between two physicians equal in skill, strength of nerve, and will. One is kind and gentle in manner, the other coarse and brutal. Think you the latter would be preferred?

In many cases it is unjust to judge a man by his beliefs. Yet many do, and think a man's belief governs his conduct and makes him what he is, and yet at the same time declare him to be good in spite of his belief, just as they say a Christian is good in spite of his Christianity. No doubt Brother Peck is good in spite of his belief.

Any careful and observant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER for the past six or seven years who has contrasted the temper manifested by writers on Materialism and Spiritualism, can not hav failed to observe that the former seem to prefer the eye for an eye and tooth for a tooth way of treating their opponents, while the latter avoid harsh names and ridicule, preferring gentleness and kindly reason. He must be blind indeed who cannot see which is farthest advanced in the scale of civilization, whether belief has anything to do with it or not. The man who is gentle, kind, and considerate of the feelings and prejudices of his fellows is infinitly preferable as a companion to him who is the reverse. They who left the church because of too much hell-fire for comfort, to say nothing of their objection to the kind of spirit evinced in the creation of hell by the God who designed it, are not likely to embrace any doctrin advocated by men who manifest a spirit of vindictivness toward those yet sitting in mental darkness. Such conduct too closely imitates the so-called Christians' God to be attractiv. R. M. ROBINSON.

PORTSMOUTH, O., Sept. 22, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I find much interest in perusing the communications of John Peck, of Naples, N. Y., a quill-pusher, a literary man, of the right sort. He is not too sarcastic, and his words do not shock, as some say. His language, his expressions on Jehovah and the Christian religion, are all right. His indictment and arraignment of heaven's demons aud their earthly lieutenants and followers is eminently correct, and that's what hurts. John Peck is a brave man. He is a benefactor, is true and noble, and has been endowed with nature's best gifts—appreciating the loving, the good, and the kind, battling for the highest possible standard of life, for the intellectual freedom of the human race. "The world is his country, and to do good is his religion."

The most extreme opposit to John Peck is the preacher. He is enlisted in the army of ignorance. He is fighting what Calvinistic barbarians and Methodist pirates call the "good fight." A fight which in fact brands the mind as property and engraves upon it the pictures of a heaven with a few crowned and bloodthirsty villains, and a hell crowded with their innocent and honest victims, which so changes the intellect that virtue seems a vice, and vice becomes virtue; which robs the cradle of its joys, which makes of happy childhood a gloomy period, and which clothes the coffin in that damnable drapery called fear; which makes of happiness an exile, and of life a barren desert waste. A sky-pilot is like the quivering leaf of a tree—he is driven in all directions before the wind. He is found with the crowd who supply him with silver and with gold, and with that crowd he hallooes the loudest and slanders the fastest. He fights the "good fight" to the bitter end. His face is long drawn, his eyes are set in the direction of the sky (except in cases when they turn to wink at a female member of the choir), and his ears are always wide open to catch a call from on high to elope to Canada or to another pulpit to hie. The other day an old gentleman from Meigs county, this state, came to Portsmouth to solicit aid for the Presbyterian flock in his neighborhood. I believe the real object is to erect a God-house. Of course he called on John G. Peebles, Esq., a Presbyterian deacon, and a very rich man, for assistance, and I am informed was promised aid. Peebles always givs to the church. He is their right-hand financial bower in this section. To an Ashland, Ky., church I am told he gave the cornerstone and a money consideration. The stone was taken from a quarry owned by him, and as placed in the church edifice bears his advertisment, a free "ad," as it were, under the seal and signature of his unknown and unseen friend, Jehovah. The minister of the church which Mr. Peebles attends is Rev. J. D. Blackburn. He was invited by the old gentleman from Meigs to go up and preach several begging sermons in the neighborhood, and he has since been inquiring around how the residents in that part of Ohio are fixed, financially speaking, and if liberal or not. You see, to preach a sermon and pray for money, and then no money come in, would be a hard blow for Presbyterianism. It would cause some one to shout, "You hav no power," "Heaven is deaf and dumb to your pleadings." I would not giv one man of honest conviction for ten thousand men of opinions.

The colored Allen Methodist Episcopal church of this city has been all torn up of late over the way some of the brethren hav been acting. It seems they hav been hugging and kissing certain sisters in the dark places of the "highways and hedges." One brother, a class leader, as a punishment has had his class taken from him. The justice in this I cannot see. The poor fellow was simply following in the footsteps of David of old, and David was "a man after God's own heart." WILL S. ANDRES.

PAULINE, ARK., Sept. 28, 289.

MR. EDITOR: They hav had a religious revival. It was near Pauline, Ark., and under a brush arbor. They hav had what they call a good time. They sung and prayed and laughed and shouted. Three or four girls "came through," i. e., got religion, and several others are mourning, mourning, mourning, no one knows what for, except because the parson tells them to. Those girls, those dear mourning girls, whose ages range from twelve to eighteen, are as innocent as sunshine, as harmless as doves, and as pure as purity itself. I said to a Christian friend, "What are those girls mourning about? What hav they done that they should be down on their knees imploring divine mercy? What crime hav they committed? Hav they murdered anybody?" "No," said he, "they could not bear to murder even a kitten." "Hav they told lies about their neighbors?" "No, they hav done nothing of the kind. The very thought of bearing false witness would cause them to shudder and blush with shame." "Well, then, what hav they done that would soil the soul or tarnish the fair name of woman?" "Nothing," says he, "absolutely nothing that would lower the dignity, decrease the virtue, or lessen the happiness of the human race." "Then, if they hav done nothing, why hav them mourn? Why wet the cheeks with tears—cheeks that ought to be smiling with love and joy? Why bring sobs and moans from a heart that ought to rejoice for the good it has done? Why break a young and tender heart that ought to be strengthened and encouraged by the strong bands of kindness, sympathy, and love? Why murder the joys of life? Why pollute the understanding, the intelligence, the souls of the pure and good, by telling them that they ought to be damned to eternal fire?" "Oh," said he, "their soul's salvation is worth more and of more importance to them than all the joys of this life." "Stuff! nonsense! Foolish nonsense! Are they trying to get forgivness for something that you or the preacher has done? Do I not see your daughter among the mourners?" "Yes," said he. "She was thirteen years old last Sunday, and I am truly glad to see her seeking the Lord so early in life, and I pray God that he will convert her."

I became so filled with emotions of sympathy for the poor misguided mourners that tears began to trickle down my cheeks. At this my friend remarked: "I perceive that God is working upon you. May he convert you to his cause before this meeting closes." I made no reply but kept on thinking. My country! My country! When, oh, when will these bigoted, superstitious, egotistical spiders quit weaving their deceitful webs to catch the innocent flies of youth?

Think of a Methodist, a Baptist, a Presbyterian, or any other kind of preacher leaving his family at home dependent upon the charities of others for meat and bread! Think of that preacher under a brush arbor, telling girls and young ladies whose pure lives are just beginning to bud and blossom into womanhood to "Come now and mourn and get good, as I am—good, as I am." Think of that, he who can without blushing for our boasted civilization. "A just and merciful God will roast you forever in a burning hell." But this picture is too gloomy to dwell upon any longer.

I said to my friend as I started to leave him: "If you would weave your webs so as to catch only the bad, wicked, cruel, monstrous flies, how much better it would be!"

And the whole thing that troubles me is that I am powerless to right the wrong. Argument will not reach such intellects. All we can do is to work on, and sadly and sorrowfully, yet patiently, wait for evolution to do its work.

R. HENRY HAWKINS.

POCAHONTAS, ILL., June 25, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: I beg your indulgence to allow me to make known my gratitude to others who are engaged in the propaganda of Liberalism, and to speak a few words of encouragement. A few days since I was in a village and got into a controversy with a young man about religion, and in order to try to dumfound me he said very irrelevantly that Colonel Ingersoll acknowledged at his brother's grave that there is a God. I bet him $10 that it was not so, and offered to put up the money, but he would not. I embarrassed him by repeating many vicious, immoral commands from the Bible. He was very indignant and insulting, but I kept after him until he left the story. One day last week I was at another village and was assured that the Methodist pulpit-pounder was a gentleman, and was advised by an intimate friend to call on him, but not finding him at home I inquired for him on the street, and having him pointed out I went where he was seated, surrounded by the town roughs and Methodist brethren. I told him I had heard he was a gentleman and a scholar; that I did not believe the Bible to be the word of God and I thought he might enlighten me upon the subject, whereupon he flew into convulsions, villifying me in a most shocking manner. I told him I supposed he expected a star in his crown when he got to glory for his tirade of abuse. I told the crowd who assisted him in ridiculing me that that was the common stock in trade of the Christian; and for all he was so vindictiv he finally abandoned the field and entered the store of his Methodist brother. If this letter appears in THE TRUTH SEEKER I'll try to get the gentle lamb of God to read it, that he may know that he is becoming notorious. As for arguments, he advanced none; and as for his excuses for the biblical mistakes, they were so vague that they refuted themselvs. As for his lies, they were too glaring and too numerous to need any answer.

I hav just returned from the post-office, and what a load of literature I received from George J. Remsburg and from the Freethinkers' Magazine! I hav disposed of almost all, as they are what I hav read previously. Oh, how it thrills me with joy to find so many so deeply in earnest in the matters of reform, and especially in the Infidel propaganda! I am working with a Liberal, Brown by name, and nearly every night giv a sermon full of satire on the church or Bible; or a lecture on phrenology, showing the impossibility of that science and the Bible both being true; or a lecture on the advantages of Liberalism over Christianity, thus molding the minds of all who come under my influence to discard the Bible and accept science.

I hav just finished reading "Christian Absurdities," "Bible Morals," "Divinity of Jesus Christ," and "Studies on Theology." The last, by Shaw, caps the climax.

If the Infidels are as diligent the next five years as they hav been the last twelve months, may we not get public opinion on our side, so that Robert G. Ingersoll can be president of the United States? EX-REV. JOSEPH N. MAXEY.

BROOKLYN, N. Y., Sept. 29, 289.

MR. EDITOR: At the conclusion of my long-delayed response to a request that special attention should be paid to science in THE TRUTH SEEKER, I offered a few remarks on Spiritism that were incidentally suggested to my mind by the facts brought to view in my discussion of matter, motion, and planetary formation. But I never had a thought of making the discussion of Spiritism a specialty, nor the main question in connection with some other. Nevertheless, if Mr. J. K. Perry, or any other satirist, desires to provoke a wrangle with me on the subject, he will probably find that I hav an obliging disposition and am inclined to giv as good as I get and a liberal rate of interest.

I had no suspicion that my suggestions on Spiritism had force enough to knock any Spiritist so entirely off his base that he has not sense enough to perceive the plain, logical import of my propositions, nor even to restate correctly. My first proposition assumes that "science is knowledge; hence, unless theories are the logical import of known facts, they are evidently not science, but vagaries." Judging popular theories by that definition, I lost confidence in them in early youth, and hav not found it yet. An intelligent sane person would infer from that proposition that I hav simply lost confidence, or never had any, in popular theories that hav the evidence of being but vagaries. But Mr. Perry evidently mistakes popular vagaries for science, and jumps to the conclusion that I reject science. That being the method by which all his conclusions are reached, further comment is unnecessary except to note the unimportant fact that he has expended an unnecessary amount of labor to make himself ridiculous for the amusement or disgust of your intelligent readers. Half the effort would hav served reasonably well.

Mr. Perry inquires how I know that there is no scientific reason that I can perceive, etc. It being obvious that any person, though a fool, should know what he can or cannot perceive, his question is suggestiv of idiocy or insanity. His misquoting my propositions should not excuse him from that imputation, for his misquotations being evidently not the result of ignorance or accident, we should charitably impute them to idiocy or insanity. He has not criticised any of my propositions, but his own misquotations and perversions of them, and misquotations and perversions are usually open to both criticism and censure.

Everybody knows that organic formations are effected by the gradual assimilation of their constituents; but planets are conglomerations of inorganic matter; and they could not possibly hav been formed except by the well-known rapid process of gravitation. The matter, or formations of matter, that compose our planet could not hav gravitated until it had acquired a gravitating ponderosity by its formation; and, when matter had acquired a gravitating ponderosity, expanded matter could not sustain its weight and gravitation became an absolute necessity. Hence it is obvious that the various substances that compose our planet, and their gravitation, was necessarily simultaneous; and they were evidently plastic when deposited and became solidified by chemical assimilation after the planet was formed.

Mr. Perry desires to know what difference I hav discovered between attraction and gravitation. I answer simply this—and it is not a new discovery that attraction is not a known but a supposed fact that is continually becoming more questionable—a few years ago the needle of the mariner's compass was supposed to be polarized by attraction, but is now reasonably well known to be polarized by the passage of electricity that is continually passing from the equator to the poles. Gravitation is a positivly known and indisputable fact, and is obviously caused by the ponderosity of matter; no other cause is provable. I think that difference between attraction and gravitation should be broad enough and clear enough for even a Spiritualist to perceive and comprehend it. There being no evidence of, or necessity for, such a property in nature as attraction, especially not as a cause of motion, which appears to be the only purpose it is supposed to serve, the theory of attraction as the cause of gravitation is obviously a delusion; and the attraction of gravitation being insusceptible of proof by any known facts in nature, it is obviously a myth; acknowledged facts in pseudo science to the contrary notwithstanding. I am not prepared to accept the opinions and theories of Professors Tom, Dick, and Harry, as unimpeachable authority, except to the extent that they are indorsed by known facts.

Mr. Perry correctly states my proposition that my physical senses and imagination are liable to deceive me unless subjected to strict supervision of reason, but perverts the import; for it implies that I will not accept the evidence of my physical senses and imagination if reason rejects; and I hav yet to meet an intelligent sane person who will; but Mr. Perry seems to think that we should, in deference to Spiritism, and I think it obvious that we must, or reject Spiritism. For the facts that hav been thus far presented simply prove that so-called spirit manifestations are produced through the agency, or the mediumship, of living physical organisms. That fact is suggestiv that the manifestations are produced by living physical organisms, and that there is probably no other agency that is capable of producing or presenting them. We should not permit our view of that fact to be obscured, nor our attention to be diverted from it, by any amount of their silly and absurd sophistry. When I hav witnessed spirit manifestations that are evidently presented by spirits, without the intervention of living, physical organisms, I shall hav evidence of intelligent spirit existence outside and independent of living physical organisms that reason will accept, notwithstanding my preconceived notions, or the impressions that the evidence thus far presented has made upon my intellectual organs.

Mr. Perry having been preëminently successful in his late effort to make himself ridiculous, I will cordially invite him to try again, and will suggest the expediency of his endeavoring to learn the truth intelligently and to present it clearly, instead of endeavoring to pervert and obscure the truth with misquotations, misrepresentation, and exaggerations.

J. A. TUTTLE.

DETROIT, MICH., Sept. 23, 1889.

MR. EDITOR: My friends, O. S. Barrett and C. L. James, seem to be so much struck with my last letter as to hav nothing to say but "'Tain't so." Mr. Barrett, in THE TRUTH SEEKER of May 18th, says: "Very truly C. L. James's plan of issuing money would be of no value. Each could repudiate his neighbor's or his own." I heartily indorse J. H. Wood's plan. Let government do all the furnishing money. In place of national banks substitute subtreasuries. Loan money at one per cent. Hold a paper dollar at par, no fluctuations in money values. In THE TRUTH SEEKER of July 13th Mr. Barrett says: "Mr. Wood and C. L. James both want the Constitution revised to suit their crowd. One claims Anarchy is the medicin that will heal the nation's wounds; the other thinks the promis to pay of every jackass is good enough," and then remarks, "What a consistent condition of government would be realized did things conform to their liking!" Now, as I hav never thought of any Tom, Dick, or even a jackass ever issuing any promises to pay, or anybody but the government of a country, I am at a loss to know the necessity of his words. Both Mr. James and Mr. Wood at least hav a strong desire to be free and see their fellow-creatures enjoy liberty. We do not find fault with the Editor for giving space for Socialists, Anarchists, Harman and company, or even orthodoxy. We believe in liberty and advocate those acts and proceedings which we believe will produce the effect of freedom for all. In the last issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER Mr. Barrett says that I intimate that his knowledge of financial history is lacking, and says that "it does not take a very profound financier to determin the fallacy of the promis to pay and issuance the gentleman advocates." As I hav never advocated any promise to pay to be issued, I must think that Mr. Barrett is a little off somehow. He says; "The one per cent interest he [I] scoffs at and attempts to show its insignificance. [This is not so. I believe that any interest is needless and wrong.] It needs no criticism—anyone can understand it—that an attempt to run a government without a basis on the Anarchist order would be an indiscriminate tooth-and-nail fight. The wolf would eat the kid. He may hav a foundation to base his system on, but he does not formulate a reasonable one." But all this is simply incoherent. No one can disentangle Mr. Barrett's talk. I hav no theory of government to giv. When people are free they are not governed, and when people are governed they are not, can not, be free. I hav no basis for money except the same that greenbacks are based upon, the government or head of the nation. It has proved the best and truest that the world has ever used, despite the efforts and labors of the moneylenders to destroy it. I hope Mr. Barrett will read over his past letters and try to make a little order out of the chaos. It will help him to better arrange letters in future, so as not to get more than half a dozen subjects mixed in as many sentences. And now Mr. James comes at me to say that I may hav a financial theory straight, though he is unable to make out what it is. Well, my financial theory is not a theory, but a practical fact that has been with the people for twenty-five years past. I want the greenbacks and nothing else. I want enough of them to enable every person to pay every dollar they owe. That is the whole of my financial theory. Can you understand it now, Mr. James? If there were sufficient legal tender (or lawful) money in circulation, so that every person could pay cash in every transaction or exchange, there would be no more interest, usury, or debt. No bank could hav an existence, as no one would borrow and pay interest. You say the wildcat banks were a fraud because they pretended that they would redeem in specie. No. That was not the fraud of the system. The fraud was in the government, who alone had the power, and whose duty it was to make money and issue it to the people, but who, refusing to do their duty, gave a license to anyone who could get a little specie to issue his notes, a counterfeit of real money. I had actual experience of wildcat counterfeit money, and yet our government protected this fraud, and punished people for imitating the counterfeit fraud that they had put upon the people at the bidding of the moneylenders.

You say that the expenses of mutual banking would not come from interest but from clerical fees. Now, where do the clerical fees come from? It must be from interest or from taxation. Greenback expenses come from the whole people as a part of the expenses of government. If government paid out greenbacks for all public expenses and all taxation were abolished, ninety-nine per cent of the cost of government would soon vanish away and every other evil go with it. You say as to my assertion that government paper never depreciates, you would like to know what I call it when $1 in gold would fetch $2 85. My friend, not $2.50. You say that the high price of all commodities in greenbacks at the same time showed that it was not gold, that had risen in value, but greenbacks which had fallen. Now, if you had taken pains to look over the history of the battles and daily reports of the war you would not hav made such an assertion. I will read you from the report of Mr. Fessenden, secretary of the treasury, 1864. He said: "The experience of the last few months [December, 1864], cannot hav failed to convince the most careless observer that, whatever may be the effect of a redundant currency upon the price of coin, other causes hav exercised a greater and more deleterious influence. In the course of a few days the price of this article rose from $1.50 to $2.85 in paper for $1 in specie, and subsequently fell in as short a period to $1.87, and then rose again as rapidly to $2.50, and all without any assignable cause, traceable to an increase or decrease of circulation of paper money, or an expansion or contraction of credit or other similar influence on the market. It is quite apparent that the solution of the problem may be found in the unpatriotic and criminal efforts of speculation and probably of secret enemies to raise the price of coin [not depreciate the value of greenbacks], regardless of the injury inflicted upon the country or desiring to inflict it."

In 1864, when 25 8 grains of gold were worth $2 85 in greenbacks, $6 30 of the latter would buy a barrel of flour—or in other words, in 1864 a trifle over $2 in gold would buy a barrel of flour. Do you, does anyone, pretend that when a great war was upon us flour had depreciated from $5 25 in 1860 to $2 30 in 1864? If when gold was $2.85 greenbacks had depreciated to thirty-five cents on the dollar, as the hard money press claim, then all the products of American labor had depreciated in a corresponding ratio. For with all the ups and downs of gold and greenbacks, debts and labor kept comparativly even pace. My reductio ad absurdum is true; all history, all experience will prove it, if you will examin it. The state savings bank of this city, in a little paper issued monthly, says that money is the necessaries of life packed in convenient form. If you are hungry money will buy food. If you are naked money will buy clothes. If you are sick money will buy medicin. You work day after day for that which you need to make you comfortable, and you receive it in the form of money. Now, every person knows that this is literally and practically true. While it is true that no one is ever compelled by any law to part with his goods for money, it is equally true that money would at once relieve every case of want, privation, and misery in this land, and every other. But it must be money, and nothing else, the fiat of all the people through the government or head of the nation. Now let us hav no more myths to prove fallacies true. I assert that if our government will issue ten thousand millions of legal tender money and cease to tax the people or to license banks or brokers, every evil that anyone complains of in this country will cease to be, and universal prosperity such as never was known on earth will surely follow.

Children's Corner.

Edited by MISS SUSAN H. WIXON, Fall River, Mass., to whom all Communications for this Corner should be sent.

"Between the dark and the daylight,
When the night is beginning to lower,
Comes a pause in the day's occupations
That is known as the Children's Hour."

Motherless.

Two small rosebuds whipped in the wind,
Deary me;
Sad little rosebuds ling'ring behind,
Lost birds at sea.
Gone are the sisters, fled with the others,
Alone in the wet grass, where are the mothers?
Beautiful mothers, blooming and fair,
Charming the very birds out of the air
And cheering me.

I saw their mates brief whiles ago
Waving red,
While cool, sweet winds came sighing low
About my head,
And over the tall grass, deep in the hedges,
Where the yellow primrose leaved in the sedges,
There the listening peach and plum trees heard,
And told the neighbors every word
That was said.

But not one of them there that day
Cried, "Come in!
Lone little orphans cast away
From your kin,"
Till one poor withered thing beside her garden
Hearing much of musty creeds and pious burden,
Said, "Hither, little lost buds of the plain,
Here's shelter from the fierce heat and the rain,
I hav left of love and room a bit to spare,
And gladly would your fragrant memories bear
My heart within."

MARY BAIRD FINCH.

Frenchtown, Neb., Sept. 13, 289.

A Happy Lunch Party.

"Now, pussy, let me tie your bib,
And make it nice and neat,
And you shall hav some lunch with us,
I'm sure 'twill be a treat.

"Now, Puss, you mustn't run and mew,
But sit right here by me,
And try to be as ladylike
As ever you can be.

"Come, sit up on the table now,
And hold your head up. There!
We hav a dish of bread-and-milk,
And you shall hav your share.

"I'm sure you must be very tired
Of eating only mice,
With now and then a scrap of meat,
Or something not so nice."

And Pussy meekly shuts her eyes,
And sheathes her pointed claws
Beneath the padded cushion
Of her dainty velvet paws.

And though she feels a little strange,
And somewhat bashful, too,
She takes her share of bread-and-milk
Without a single "mew."

In Our Own Corner.

Here we are, little ones and big, in our own cosy Corner, ready for a chat upon any topic that presents. We can readily talk about what we know, and by inquiring, we can find out much that we do not know.

This is a big world that we liv in, and if life could be prolonged here for a thousand years, at the end of that time there would undoubtedly be a great deal of useful information still unlearned.

It is quite certain that among the many varied subjects presented to the student of nature, not one is more interesting and important than the life and well-being of humanity.

Take a little child, just born into the world—how much there is before it! Experienced people, that is, parents, teachers, and thoughtful persons, tremble almost at the contemplated career of a child, not knowing how it will be shaped, or whither it may tend. We always hope for the best, but none can exactly foretell the future.

Now, everybody has a great deal to contend with, you know, in life, and one needs to be well equipped with all the virtues, to meet the foes that lurk in ambush on every side, whose work is to injure and destroy.

Here are bodies to be cared for. We want them to be clean and healthful. There are passions, too, to be ruled and subdued. Ruled by what? By the intellect—the front brain. Reason tells us when we are right and when we are wrong. Let us try to make Reason king, and obey that sovereign.

These bodies of ours are like houses that we liv in. We must try and keep them pure and undefiled, unsullied by even a vile thought. We should learn all about them, the office and use of every part of our being; we should seek to know all the laws that govern and control us, and strive to obey those laws as best we can. We ought to try and improve on ourselvs—to overcome all that would bring us to harm, and to develop and cultivate that which will lift us morally and intellectually. If we disobey the laws of nature—her true and simple laws, not abnormal rules—we shall suffer, but when we observe her laws, we experience happiness and feel justly rewarded. Now, as we part for this time, let us each and all resolve to liv pure, healthful, and noble lives, as free from wrong and impurity as possible, and strive as we go on the journey of life to make the world a little better than it was when we came upon the stage of action. S. H. W.

Unlucky Sayings.

A child may often be expected to put his heedless little foot into his mouth. For instance, a youngster one day begged an invitation to dinner at the house of a little friend with whom he had been playing. At the table his hostess anxiously inquired: "Charley, can you cut your own meat?" "Humph!" said the youngster, who was sawing away, "can't I? I've cut up quite as tough meat as this at home." People who are destitute of tact might take warning from such juvenil malapropos, but such does not often appear to be the case, judging by the numerous examples to the contrary.

"I never open my mouth but I put my foot in it," was the curious complaint of some unlucky wight who might hav received consolation had he reflected on the number that daily keep him company. The guardsman's remark to the English nobleman who was in the habit of affably conversing with soldiers: "I like you, my lord; there's nothing of the gentleman about you," offers an example of the kind, says Chambers's Journal. "How many deaths?" asked a hospital physician. "Nine." "Why, I ordered medicin for ten." "Yes, but one would not take it," was the startling reply. "Hillo! where are you going at this time of the night?" said a gentleman to his servant. "You are after no good, I'll warrant." "Please, sir, mistress sent me for you, sir," was the response. A gentleman said to the waiter of his club: "Michael, if I should die, would you attend my funeral?" "Willingly, sir," was the hasty answer. "Well, Michael, that is not very complimentary." "No, sir, I didn't mane that, sir; I wouldn't be seen there, sir," was the waiter's consolatory reply.

Correspondence.

OAK MILLS, KAN., Sept. 13, 1889.

DEAR MISS WIXON: The news of Horace Seaver's death was so sad to me. I read your beautiful and touching tribute with tears in my eyes. Colonel Ingersoll's funeral oration was a grand thrill of eloquence. He paid an able tribute to the memory of his dead friend.

I conduct a little magazine called Golden Dawn, devoted to the interests of Freethought and all true reforms. The magazine is designed and executed by myself with pen and pencil. The September number of my magazine is a memorial to Horace Seaver. The first page is adorned with a portrait of Mr. Seaver, around which clusters a wreath of vines and flowers, and at his side is a picture of a pen and the Boston Investigator, and over the portrait are the words, "In Memory of Horace Seaver." The pages are all draped in mourning. It is my humble tribute to the memory of the great, good, and noble Horace Seaver. I hav been running the magazine for over a year. The size is about 5x7 inches. It generally contains about ten pages, with two columns to the page. I print them just for amusement, and distribute them among my friends. I like to do such work, and besides I think it is beneficial to myself and interesting to my friends, as I hav received many letters of thanks from them. I am glad they appreciate my humble efforts. Every copy contains Freethought news.

A beautiful monument to the memory of Gen. U. S. Grant was unveiled in Fort Leavenworth on Saturday, September 14th. I was there and enjoyed myself very highly. I had the pleasure of listening to an eloquent oration by America's great Agnostic statesman. Hon. John J. Ingalls of the United States Senate. He is undoubtedly one of the ablest men that ever sat in the United States Senate. He is a fine figure on the platform—tall and commanding, with a fine voice that rings out the grandest peals of eloquence. He starts out in a slow, quiet manner, but as he proceeds he grows more forcible, and his sentences, so logically expressed, overflow with the richest streams of eloquence. I hav heard him several times and I do not regret it, but I do regret that I cannot hear him oftener. Among the other speakers of the occasion were Hon. Geo. Peck, General Blair, General Merrit, and others. The monument, standing on a little knoll, was surrounded by a large platform, and on this sat many prominent men, including the speakers. When the monument was unveiled it was a sad scene, and tears came to the eyes of many of the old veterans standing around. The monument was mounted with a bronze statue of General Grant, representing him at the capture of Fort Donelson, and the figure appeared very natural. The monument is a fine one and appropriate. There were thousands of people present and the day will long be remembered by them all.

I had a few other things to write, but I will drop them for the next time, as this letter is getting long. Please excuse all mistakes, as I am writing in a hurry. With best wishes, I am, Ever your friend,

GEORGE J. REMSBURG.

[Many thanks for the above interesting letter. Our friend George is doing brave and good work for Freethought, and givs fair promis of much future usefulness. Success to his efforts.—ED. C. C.]

A Little Mischief.

Who dug up the corn when it was just sprouted? The crow? No. Who then? Why, the rabbit. Who gnawed the bark off the pear-tree? The same animal. He should be called then, the Little Mischief. But is he not pretty? How soft and fine is his fur, and look at his round, bright pink eyes, and his long ears laid back on his shoulders. His family name is Hare, and in Europe he is known as Mr. Coney, while in France they call him Monsieur Lapin. We know him in this country as that little rogue, the rabbit.

He cannot run very fast, so he does not venture out much by daylight, but takes his rambles after dark. His home is called a burrow, because it is burrowed or dug in the ground.

When rabbits are six months old they begin to be papas and mammas, and their children are very numerous indeed. If nobody interfered, one pair of rabbits would, it is said, in four years become the progenitors of more than one million two hundred and fifty thousand children! Now, you can see that we should soon be, at this rate of increase, overrun by rabbits, did not the hunters with their dogs, besides other animals, as the fox, woodchuck, and weasel, come in to stem this tide, by mercifully cutting short this reckless spread of rabbit life. Rabbits are of various colors, black and white being the most prevalent. They are killed for their beautiful fur, and their flesh makes a delicate and nutritious food. Their little nests are soft and cosy, and lined with their own fur. Their babies come into the world naked and blind like kittens, but they grow rapidly; and their average life when let alone reaches nine or ten years.

The gray rabbit is more like the real hare, and can run swiftly, but it cannot be made tame as can the other rabbits.

In Mexico there is a kind of rabbit known as the sage, and in Texas there is a long-eared fellow which is called the jackass rabbit, probably on account of his very long ears.

Rabbits are sociable with each other, and it is quite common among them to transmit their burrows or dwelling-places to their descendants, so that some can boast of living in the home of their great-great-great-great-grandfather.

Of course you can all repeat the dear old nursery rhyme:

Bye low, Baby Bunting,
Daddy's gone a hunting,
To get a little rabbit skin
To wrap the baby Bunting in.

S. H. W.

QUESTIONS.—Name a mischievous animal. Describe the rabbit. What is his family name? What is he called in Europe? in France? in America? At what time does he come from his home mostly? Why is his home called a burrow? At what age do rabbits become parents? How fast do they multiply? How is this increase prevented? For what are rabbits valuable? Describe the rabbits' nest; their young. What is the length of their lives? What can you say of the gray rabbit? the sage? the Texan rabbit? Are rabbits sociable in their habits? Do they transmit their homes to their children? Repeat the nursery rhyme.

A Foolish Text.

"Love thy neighbor as thyself?"
What a foolish preacher!
Thou art dearer than myself.
Neighbor, sweetheart, teacher.

None is equal to thyself,
Thou art far above me,
And I dare not ask myself,
Would she stoop to love me?

None I love except thyself—
Kneel in awe before thee—
And I only hate myself
That I'm all unworthy.

"Love thy neighbor as thyself?"
Parson's lost his labor,
Fool I'd be to love myself
As I love my neighbor.

—William K. Welsh in Life.

Literary Notices.

The Golden Perhaps is the title assumed by a paper just started at Denver, Col. The paper is a Freethought one, and we wish it success in its work. Dr. C. W. McCormick is editor and proprietor. Subscription, $2.

"Social Ethics," is the title of an anti-Prohibition book by E. H. Heywood. He lays stress on the benefits of developing that strength of individual character that enables a man to decline intoxicants. He thinks that we should not be protected outside, but rather made strong inside. Price, 15 cents.

"Vorträge von Hedwig Henrich-Wilhelmini." With pleasure we call the attention of our German-speaking friends to this little volume of Freethought lectures, a study of which will repay even the veteran Freethinker. In the lectures, twelve in number, Frau Henrich-Wilhelmini touches all those questions which at the present time engage the mind of every thoughtful person, not alone the whence? why? and whither? but pagan and Christian antiquities, woman's rights, etc. She shows us the inconsistencies, immoralities, and cruelties of the Christian religion and church; the superiority of Freethought and science. She pictures off the "Joy of Life," brings us face to face with "Death," and closes her series with an essay on "Cremation." The language is plain, but logical and convincing, and it is evident that the authoress knows not alone what she is speaking about, but believes it herself, and intends her readers shall do the same. We seek in vain for witty remarks, for funny anecdotes, yes, even for sarcasm, but we do find a love for mankind and for everything true and good. Now and then she indulges in lofty scorn, but always in an appeal to every-day, good common sense, and it is the last trait, we think, which will make the little work an excellent one to present or lend to your German Christian friends; and we do not see how the latter, after a careful perusal of its pages and a little subsequent thinking, can fail to exclaim with David Strauss, "We are Christians no longer." The volume, which contains a likeness of the authoress, and a short introduction by Herr C. Herman-Boppe, is printed in large, clear type, on good paper, and is published by Der Freidenker Publishing Co., Milwaukee, Wis. 192 pp., price 50 cents. Can be obtained, like any other book reviewed in this paper, through the office of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The September number of the North American Review contains the very interesting announcement that the entire control has been purchased by the Hon. Lloyd Bryce, to whom a controling interest in the Review was bequeathed by the late Mr. Rice, and that his purpose is to conduct it as a magazine of the times, on the lines laid down and followed by his predecessor with such remarkable success. The present issue fully bears out the announcement made by the new editor and proprietor. Three of the uppermost topics of the day are treated by men of acknowledged authority on the subjects on which they write. "The Value of International Exhibitions" is discussed by Senator Hawley; Dr. Brown-Séquard's "Elixir of Life" by Dr. William A. Hammond, and "Capital Punishment by Electricity" by Elbridge T. Gerry, Esq. Senator Hawley's familiarity with previous expositions makes his contribution of especial timeliness and value, particularly in view of the lively interest aroused by the efforts of New York and other cities to secure the World's Fair of 1892. Dr. Hammond declares that it is unscientific to deny that there can be such a thing as an elixir of life, and thinks that valuable results may follow Dr. Brown-Séquard's discovery. Another topic of perhaps equal interest and timeliness is dealt with by Dr. Henry C. McCook—"Can the Musketo be Exterminated?" Dr. McCook thinks that, while the pest cannot be wholly wiped out, it can be greatly mitigated by the draining of swamps, etc., and by the propagation of the musketo's natural enemies, the dragon-fly and the spider. Besides Lord Wolseley's fourth chapter of "An English View of the Civil War," there are contributions from two other well-known Englishmen. Canon Farrar gives the reasons why he is an Episcopalian, and in "The Transformation of Paris" Frederic Harrison, Esq., contrasts the Paris of 1789, a medieval town, with the gay, bright, fascinating city as we know it to-day. Gen. John Pope has a striking paper on "Common-Sense and Civil-Service Reform," in which he urges that the appointments to offices throughout the country should be made by the members of Congress, and he would hold them responsible for the good or bad character of the officials appointed. The Hon. Henry Cabot Lodge, of Massachusetts, discusses some of the important questions that will be taken up by "The Coming Congress." In "Nurseries of Crime," Inspector Byrnes, of the New York police department, points out the evils that flow from the unregulated lodging-house system of the city.

The article in the October Popular Science Monthly that will attract the most attention is the one that heads the list, "Pensions for All." The writer, Gen. M. M. Trumbull, is anxious that the "pension temptation" shall not bring dishonor upon the Grand Army, and he reproves treasury raiders. The number is marked by the great variety of its contents. Dr. M. Allen Starr has an illustrated article on "The Old and the New Phrenology," showing what has been really ascertained about the location of the faculties in the brain. A lively picture of "Evolution as Taught in a Theological Seminary," is given by Rollo Ogden, a seminary in New York being the institution criticised. There is an entertaining sketch of "Life at the Cameroons," by Robert Müller, M.D. Dr. Robson Roose writes on the "The Art of Prolonging Life," giving advice as to the care of body and mind, and telling what length of days may be expected. The article on "Education in Ancient Egypt," by F. C. H. Wendel, will surprise many, who would not suppose so much information on the subject was obtainable. Mr. W. H. Larrabee contributes a second illustrated article on the antiquities of Sweden, this one dealing with the "Bronze Age." In "Anthropology at Washington," Prof. J. Howard Gore describes the organization and methods of the government scientific bureaus engaged in investigating the customs and history of the Indians and mound-builders. Prof. Wesley Mills contributes a popular account of "Digestion and Related Functions." W. Bernhardt, writing of "The Chemist as a Constructor," gives cases in which almost creativ power has been attained by man through science. "The Origin of Some General Errors" is pointed out by S. Exner. P. Souriaou describes "The Pleasures of Motion." There are editorials on "The Domain of Science" and "The American Association." Miscellaneous topics are treated more briefly in the departments. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 50 cents a number, $5 a year.

We especially commend to our readers a book just written by Arthur B. Moss. We may assert positivly that they will not be disappointed in it. It will be found plain, entertaining, and instructiv. Its title is "Lectures and Essays," and it is a collection of thirteen of the best productions of the writer. There is prefixed a life of Mr. Moss, with a portrait. The binding is showy and brilliant, being red cloth. The first treatis is entitled, Two Revelations. The second is on Design and Natural Selection. Mr. Moss asserts, in regard to the noted watch illustration, that "a savage, seeing a watch for the first time, would be very unlikely to think that it had been made. Why? Because he has had no experience of watchmakers." Thus the only reason why on seeing a watch a person would infer from it a watchmaker, would be that he had had experience of watches being made by watchmakers. Other thoughts on design are:

But, if a watch is made, the maker is not also the manufacturer of the materials out of which he manipulates it. Those are already at hand; his design, or contrivance, consists merely in skilfully arranging certain parts to produce a certain result. In this case, therefore, there is no analogy between the maker of a watch and the maker of a universe. According to all Theists, God is also the maker of the materials from which he produces so many designs. Now, while man has some experience of watchmakers, he has absolutely none of universe-makers, and therefore he cannot say that the universe was made.

Nothing is more common than to see persons or animals with defectiv eyesight, and any imperfection in vision resulting from an inherent quality of the organ is an evidence either of bad design or of an absence of design altogether. To allege that an imperfect organ can be the work of an all-wise and all-powerful deity supposes that a perfect being can produce a failure. Nor could a perfect organ, designed by an almighty God, get out of order, for it is a positiv evidence of imperfect workmanship that an organ or instrument becomes impaired or rendered valueless by use. Thousands of persons born into the world are born with eyes out of which they cannot see. As Tom Hood, in one of his satirical poems, says of "Tim Turpin," who was gravel-blind:

> And ne're had seen the skies;
> For Nature, when his head was made,
> Forgot to dot his eyes.

But in this case the deficiency would be chargeable against deity; for Nature, being neither intelligent nor good, cannot be considered as answerable for her imperfect productions.

When, instead of individual objects being taken separately, we take the working of nature as a whole, we find that all animated matter is in constant warfare—the insect against the vegetable, and birds against the insects, the lower animals against birds, and man against them all. And so terrible is this struggle that, if the design argument were really true, many of the designs are of so destructiv and horrible a character as to reflect anything but credit upon the wisdom or goodness of the deity who is the alleged author.

Man, assuming in his vanity that everything was made especially for him, has arrogantly declared that everything in the universe was arranged so as to subserve his benefit.

Then the evolutionary doctrin, natural selection, is set forth in place of design. In respect of the evolution of the human race, "sexual selection, or the selection by the fittest males of the fittest females, would add considerably to the advancement of man." What are called "rudimentary organs" are explained by our principle of natural selection, but—

Rudimentary organs would be extremely difficult to understand on the principle of design. In the human ear there are several muscles in a rudimentary condition which are absolutely useless. For what purpose was the mammæ of all male quadrupeds designed? It is in a rudimentary condition and serves no useful purpose. Or of what use are the incisor teeth of ruminants that never cut through the gums? There are in man, also, various muscles which are of no utility to him, but which are highly developed in some of the lower animals. A horse and cow, for instance, twitch their skin when annoyed by flies; and, though man possesses remnants of the muscle by which this movement is effected (the panniculus carnosus), it is, for the most part, useless to him. Some men, it is true, can contract the muscles of their scalps, move their ears, or perform other extraordinary movements; but, in the large majority of human beings, these muscles are in an altogether rudimentary condition.

The conclusion is that—

In the face of the facts of evolution the design argument is no longer tenable. It has been slain alike by science and common sense, and in a few years will be consigned to that oblivion in which older and more pernicious errors hav found a well-deserved and final resting-place.

"Man and the Lower Animals" is the next treatis. The author says:

A true perception of man's close relationship to those fellow-creatures he has hitherto so despised will clear his mind of a vast amount of ignorant pride and pernicious vanity, and will make him regard inferior beings with more kind and sympathetic feelings than hitherto.

In all nations of the earth the delusion appears to prevail that man is a special creation; that he differs altogether from the lower animals. Even the naked, unclean, unveracious savage, with no idea of justice, and cruel to the last degree, vainly imagins himself immeasurably superior to the highest among the so-ealled brute creation. What these creatures think of him we hav no means of knowing. They hav not yet betaken themselvs to the task of writing books, but if some of their facial expressions may be taken as indicating their views, I should be inclined to think that their opinions of him were not altogether favorable or complimentary. . . .

If, however, the reader supposes that in this essay there is an attempt to degrade man to "the level of the brute," he is much mistaken. Man is in many respects greatly superior to the highest among the lower animals. His intelligence, though the same in kind, as I hav shown, is immensely superior to that of other mammals. As a moral creature he stands on an elevation far above all other animals. He alone can fully recognize that his conduct has reference to the well-being of the community. He cannot sin against his fellow-man without injuring himself. The happiness of the individual is thus inextricably bound up with the happiness of the community in which he livs. Man therefore stands at the head of the animated kingdom. This does not seem to me a degrading view of man's place in nature, but a true view. Man is not degraded to the level of the lower animals, but the lower animals are elevated from a false position, and placed in that relation to the highest animal which a profound study of biology reveals to be true.

We can, unfortunately, spare no more room for the good thoughts of the "Lectures and Essays." The remaining subjects are: "Fictitious Gods; Bible Saints and Sinners; The Bible God and His Favorits; Bible Horrors, or True Blasphemy; Socrates, Buddha, and Jesus; The Old Faith and the New; Health, Wealth, and Happiness; Christianity a Degrading Religion; Natural Man. The price of this interesting volume is 75 cents.

THE SPIRIT OF TRUTH: Being an Exposition of Infidelity or Religious Unbelief. By Thomas Hertell. Boston: J. P. Mendum, Investigator office. Price, 25 cents.

This book is a very good one, and one that we can recommend. It is, as it is entitled, an exposition of religious unbelief. It goes over about all the ground of religious unbelief, and in addition to being thus comprehensiv is sound and sensible in reasoning. The printing and binding is very neat. The headings of the sixteen chapters are: "Ignorance the Mother of Devotion; Religious Inquisition in Protestant Countries; Persecution; Church and State; Ignorance the Source of Moral Evil; A Humble Mechanic Began the Reformation in the Jewish Hierarchy; What Infidelity is, and who Infidels are; The True God; What God is; Miracles; False Pretenses; False Gods Easily Known; Faith no Proof of any God; When Cause Ceases to Exist, Effect Ceases to Operate; What Infidelity is, Who Infidels are, and Who are even Worse than Infidels; All Christian Sects are Unbelievers; If Faith be the Gift of God, then Who Gave Faith to All Other than the Christian Sect?" Here are passages that are not unprofitable reading:

All existing religions are but fashionable superstitions, and all exploded superstitions are religions out of fashion.

But in truth, other than superstition, there is no such thing as "religion" as a science. Existing as well as "exploded religions" are all alike based on the assumption (not knowledge) that man knows the source or cause of the existence of the universe, or the "being, architect, or power" which created and sustains it. Man not being possessed of the truth on that subject, his religion is reared not on his knowledge, but on his ignorance of the source and organization of matter, life, and mind.

Nor can the moral precepts which are extracted from pagan systems of religion, and sparingly sprinkled and mixed with those of an adverse character in the Christian Bible, relieve the Christian religion from the force of animadversion.

In Christianity's practical operation, when in the possession and exercise of unrestrained human power and influence, its worst doctrins were carried out, its true character developed, and its evil tendency illustrated by a total disregard on the part of its advocates, teachers, and professors of its moral precepts of charity, forbearance, good will to men, and the principles of equal rights and reciprocal justice, and in truth, also by the ignorance, fanaticism, and human debasement and misery which accompanied its establishment, followed its progress, and marked its way in blood, war, and devastation; and in fine, by the destruction of more millions of human victims sacrificed at the shrine of its "evil spirit" of intolerance and persecution during the "Dark Ages" of unrestrained ecclesiastic power, than fell by the combined curses of plague, pestilence, and famin.

The reformation in the Christian church was not the effect of any moral influence in the dominant faith and practice, or of the voluntary exercise of the power of the church militant in aid of its own improvement. On the contrary, it was Infidelity, that is, unbelief in its doctrins and dogmas, and opposition to the secular power of the established or dominant church which ultimated in its present altered and partially improved "faith and practice." It was unbelief in the divine origin and infallibility of the dominant church; unbelief of its doctrins, dogmata, and superstitions; a want of faith in the piety, humanity, and integrity of its ministers and advocates, which excited resistance to its despotic power, evil spirit, and immoral influence; it was Infidelity to reigning ecclesiastical power, and successful opposition to the dominant and despotic influence of the Christian church in the Dark Ages, which led to the revival of letters, to the renewed pursuit of literature, to the cultivation of the arts and sciences, to the increased knowledge of the rights and power of man, and to the consequent intellectual and moral improvement and melioration of the condition of the Christian world.

When the ignorant, the credulous, and the timid could be persuaded or commanded to profess belief in the religious dogmata of the militant church, they were deemed to hav religious faith. When by such means they could be induced to acknowledge the church to be infallible, and the opinions of the priests no less so—that "kings reign by divine appointment," that they "could do no wrong," that their vilest acts of cruelty and despotism were works of clemency and mercy, and that the life and reign of the ruling tyrant were the greatest public blessings conferred by God on man, they were estimated as true religious believers and good loyal subjects!

And further, were human testimony admissible for the purpose of obtaining a knowledge of the true God, true miracles, or true faith, the proofs and allegations of each seot for its own, are counteracted and destroyed by the opposit and overwhelming testimony of all others. Thus conclusiv proofs are exhibited that they all stand on the same ground, all rest on the same or the like human authority, and that the great balance or nearly the whole weight of human testimony goes to prove that the true God, the inscrutable and incomprehensible source of all being, is not to be found among the numereus gods which are known to man.

And it is equally evident that whatever merit any religious system may rightfully claim to possess must be measured by the moral principles and precepts it contains; that the amount of its utility must be ascertained by the extent to which it induces the moral conduct of its believers, and that its futility is unequivocally determined when its advocates manifest by their conduct a want of charity, liberality, kindness, and good will toward mankind, and traduce, proscribe, and persecute any of their fellow-men as Infidels, meaning by that word immoral and bad men, merely for a difference in opinion on subjects on which all men are equally in the dark.

ARGUMENTS in Support of Demurrer to the Indictment of M. Harman, E. C. Walker, and Geo. Harman, under the Comstock law, by C. C. Clemens and David Overmyer. Also Judge Foster's Decision overruling the demurrer. Valley Falls, Kan.; Lucifer Publishing Co. Price, 25 cents.

It is with feelings of seriousness and concern that we turn our mind to this pamphlet among our pile of books. This is no laughing matter. It is no matter of speculation, but one of immediate practical import. It is no matter that will wait, but one that must be attended to at once. It is a matter the most serious of any on earth—a case for the maintenance of Liberty. We would be glad to hav readers get this book and look into the matter in detail. The pleadings of the counsel present the arguments for the side of freedom quite ably and instructivly. We will reprint a passage. The counsel pleads for—the freedom for which Wendell Phillips so earnestly and so eloquently pleaded: "No matter whose the lips that would speak, they must be free and ungagged. Let us believe that the whole of truth can never do harm to the whole of virtue; and remember, that, in order to get the whole of truth, you must allow every man, right or wrong, freely to utter his conscience, and protect him in so doing. Entire, unshackled freedom for every man's life, no matter what his doctrin—the safety of free discussion no matter how wide its range. The community which dares not protect its humblest and most hated member in the free utterance of his opinions, no matter how false or hateful, is only a gang of slaves."

Let us check the beginnings. Liberty dies with fearful rapidity when the bloom of health does but once pale on her cheek.

Religious and Political Liberty.

In which the author shows the repeated attempts of men of every age to acquire greater political liberty; also vigorously attacks the very foundation of the religion of every age; dwelling at length upon the wrongs of Ireland, and, in detailing the account of slavery in this country, calls the attention of thinking men and women to the position of womankind in America. Throughout, the work is replete with astounding facts and weighty arguments which cannot fail to interest the minds of this age.

FOR HER DAILY BREAD.

A NINETEENTH CENTURY NOVEL.

Preface by R. G. INGERSOLL.

For Her Daily Bread is the story of two young girls and a younger brother who were left parentless, with little money, fair education, and much courage, to make their way through the world by going to Chicago. The author is also the heroin. The narrativ is, in the main, a history of a working girl's life and experience in the city of Chicago among bluff business men, kind hearted folks, and disreputable hypocrits. It is just such a story of human life as we should expect Colonel Ingersoll to be interested in; and whatever he admires and appreciates is sure to be worth the attention of the rest of the world. GIDEON IS CONVINCED THAT HE SEES AN ANGEL.

Then the angel of the Lord put forth the end of the staff that was in his hand, and touched the flesh and the unleavened cakes; and there rose up fire out of the rock, and consumed the flesh and the unleavened cakes. Then the angel of the Lord departed out of his sight. And when Gideon perceived that he was an angel of the Lord, Gideon said, Alas, O Lord God! for because I hav seen an angel of the Lord face to face.—Judges vi, 21, 22.

Gems of Thought.

IN the moral world, as in the physical world, nothing is anomalous; notbing is unnatural; nothing is strange. All is order, symmetry, and law. There are opposits, but there are no contradictions. In the character of a nation inconsistency is impossible. Such, however, is still the backward condition of the human mind, and with so evil and jaundiced an eye do we approach the greatest problems, that not only common writers, but even men from whom better things might be hoped, are on this point involved in constant confusion, perplexing themselvs and their readers by speaking of inconsistency, as if it were a quality belonging to the subject which they investigate, instead of being, as it really is, a measure of their own ignorance. It is the business of the historian to remove this ignorance, by showing that the movements of nations are perfectly regular, and that, like all other movements, they are solely determined by their antecedents. If he cannot do this, he is no historian. He may be an annalist, or a biographer, or a chronicler, but higher than that he cannot rise, unless he is imbued with that spirit of science which teaches, as an article of faith, the doctrin of uniform sequence; in other words, the doctrin that certain events having already happened, certain other events corresponding to them will also happen To seize this idea with firmness, and to apply it on al occasions, without listening to any exceptions, is extremely difficult, but it must be done by whoever wishes to elevate the study of history from its present crude and informal state, and to do what he may toward placing it in its proper rank as the head and chief of all the sciences.—Buckle's History of Civilization.

THERE is no room in the mind of man for providence or chance. The facts and forces governing thought are as absolute as those governing the motions of the planets. A poem is produced by the forces of nature, and is as necessarily and naturally produced as mountains and seas. You will seek in vain for a thought in man's brain without its efficient cause. Every mental operation is the necessary result of certain facts and conditions. Mental phenomena are considered more complicated than those of matter, and consequently more mysterious. Being more mysterious, they are considered better evidence of the existence of a god. No one infers a god from the simple, from the known, from what is understood, but from the complex, from the unknown, and incomprehensible. Our ignorance is God; what we know is science.—Ingersoll.

WHY are we to giv this church credit, when she tells us that those books are genuin in every part, any more than we giv her credit for everything else she has told us; or for the miracles she says she has performed? That she could fabricate writings is certain, because she could write; and the composition of the writings in question is of that kind that anybody might do it; and that she did fabricate them is not more inconsistent with probability than that she could tell us, as she has done, that she could and did work miracles.—Thomas Paine.

THE writings of Paine fairly glitter with simple compact, logical statements, that carry conviction to the dullest and most prejudiced. He had the happiest possible way of putting the case; in asking questions in such a way that they answer themselvs, and in stating his premises so clearly that the deduction could not be avoided.—Ingersoll

THOMAS PAINE was a theological artilleryman. He invented shells before the days of Orsini, and threw them into the camps of the monarchy and the church with fatal effect. He produced great alarm, but he also effected great destruction. His "Common Sense" changed the destiny of America. No book against theological and biblical errors ever excited so much clerical consternation as his "Age of Reason," and, despite many faults of dogmatism, of imputation, and want of taste in treatment, it is still a model of animated reasoning, of perspicuous statement, of luminous style. The title of the book is no misnomer. Paine could reason. He was a master of vigorous words and vigorous thought. His ideas are commanding in their impressivness, his figures of speech are inventions in rhetoric. Ebenezer Elliott, the great Corn law rhymer, himself no mean judge, told me that Paine was the greatest master of metaphor he ever read. None but a self-taught man, with powerful faculties, could ever hav interested the reader as Paine does. He throws nature and experience into all he says. He is never tame and never weak. No conventional believer can read the "Age of Reason" and rise up without having his eyes opened as they never were before, and without impressions which he will never forget. It is this fact which has led orthodoxy so to dread this book. No writer of the time of Paine ever had the art of interesting the common people in what he wrote as he did. He may be wrong in what he says, but he always means something, and the reader feels it.—George Jacob Holyoake.

JOHNNY'S mother was rather proud of her skill in the haircutting line, and was very fond of showing it, much to Johnny's disgust. Being nine years old he was disposed to patronize the barber. The other day when his mother was making the preparations which usually precede the terrible ordeal which he knew was to make him the laughing stock of his playmates, he remarked: "Mamma, I'm not going to hav my hair cut to day." "What do you mean, Johnnie?" "I can not allow it, ma. I'm really afraid. It's dangerous." "What on earth are you afraid of, child?" "Why, mamma," said the precocious youngster, backing into a corner, "I am surprised at you. Didn't you ever hear what happened to Samson because he let a woman cut his hair?" His mother was so thoroughly astonished that he made his escape to the street before she could say another word.

A CONGRESS of Spiritualists hav just adjourned at Paris. The meeting was attended by many enthusiastic delegates, who related some startling manifestations of spirits. EDWARD BELLAMY, putativ author of "Looking Backward," is now accused of plagiarism. The Cincinnati Commercial Gazette claims that the story was published in its columns in 1880–81 as the narrativ of Vera Zarovitch, and extracts are given to prove a clean steal. Alas, exclaims the World, whose literary reputation is safe in these days? Even Eli Perkins is suspected.

IN his report just filed for the decade ending in 1887, National Commissioner of Education Dawson shows that the system has expanded during that period, and that its growth is due entirely to the progress of the public schools in the two Southern sections, where the increase of enrolment shows an excess over the increase of population probably never before paralleled in a country so long settled.

DR. BROWN-SEQUARD expresses himself as astonished and disgusted with the manner in which his theory regarding the elixir of youth has been received in this country and England. He claims that he should not be held responsible for the misapplications of his reasoning made by sensationalists. The bungling of charlatans he especially regrets. "Epicurus was not an Epicurean, Plato was not a Platonist, Aristotle was not an Aristotelian, Dr. Puscy was not a Puseyite," says Brown-Séquard, who hopes he is not a Brown-Séquardist.

HENRY A. COOK, of Leominster, Mass., has displayed an originality as a politician which places him in the ranks of American geniuses. He wants to go to the Bay State legislature. A few nights ago he held a meeting in a public hall, nominated himself for office, and asserted that he had been a hostler, a peddler, a tramp, a grocer, a chairmaker, a combmaker, a carpenter, a blacksmith, a stablemaan, a gambler, a thief, a manufacturer, a large real-estate dealer, a detectiv, and finally a candidate for representativ. It is said that he will be elected.

PERHAPS many tourists to the Holy Land, says the Sun, will not be enthusiastic over the excellent prospects that a steam route all the way to Jerusalem will before a great while be open to travelers. Jogging slowly along on the backs of camels or donkeys is an interesting novelty to most visitors, and is far more in keeping with the historic surroundings than the prospect of being whisked behind a puffing locomotiv from Jaffa to Jerusalem in a couple of hours. Sentimental considerations, however, won't retard the railroad enterprise, and engineers are already picking out a route for the road. The sultan has granted a concession, and a company composed of French and English capitalists will supply the funds.

COLONEL OLCOTT, now preaching his creed in England, givs this explanation of the ultimate state: "The spirit is sexless. Sex is the result of the 'fall into generation.' The differentiation of sex is the result of the materialization of the functions of the androgynous original soul. But for this fall, due to the attempt to multiply the race by material means, man would hav continued to be mindborn. All progress is toward the extinction of the evil result of the fall. In the future existence Buddhists believe we pass through a state in which the passions survive; then to a second stage, where the bodies exist without the passions; and it is not until we pass into the third stage, when the bodily organs disappear, that the results of the fall are worked out."

ROMISH priests and editors are busy trying to make it appear that this is a Christian nation, also the Protestants who are clamoring for Congress to enact a Sunday observance law. Will some one tell us how a state, a corporation without a soul, can be Christian? We can readily understand how the people of a nation can call themselvs Christian, but suppose all the people of the United States were believers in Christ, would that make the state, which has neither entity, soul, or conscience, Christian? The state is the community formed for the protection of its citizens in their civil rights, to prevent crime, and afford all equal rights.—Western American.

IN the Detroit evening News an editorial entitled, "The Underlying Principles," lately appeared, in which the present political situation was reviewed and discussed. The statement was made that "the logic of Democracy is Anarchism, and the logic of Republicanism is state Socialism or Communism," and accordingly all Prohibitionists and protectionists were advised to go over to the Republicans and assume the name that properly belongs to them, while Democrats were admonished to mistrust the law and renew their old-time pledge to vigilantly guard their liberties. That no blame for these extraordinary sentiments attaches to any of the political penny-a-liners of Detroit is certain; and the finger of suspicion points to the one man in that city whose reputation for cranky notions of this sort has long since become established. But is it not astonishing to hav such revolutionary sentences stare at you from the editorial columns of a daily newspaper? The bewilderment of the respectable reader is easier fancied than described.—Liberty.

Was Abraham Lincoln a Christian?

CHAPTER III.

REVIEW OF CHRISTIAN TESTIMONY.—REED AND HIS WITNESSES.

Reed—Smith—Edwards—Lewis—Brooks—Statements of Edwards, Smith, and Brooks, Compared—Sunderland—Miner—Gurley—Failure of Reed to Establish his Claims.

Of the twenty Christian witnesses whose testimony is given in Chapter I, ten admit that, during a part of his life, Lincoln was an unbeliever, or Infidel. Of the remaining ten, not one denies the fact. It is conceded, then, that he was once an Infidel. Now, it is a rule of law that when a certain state or condition of things is once proven to exist, that state or condition is presumed to continue to exist until the contrary is proven. If Lincoln was, at one time, an Infidel, it is fair to assume that he remained an Infidel, unless it can be shown that he changed his belief and became a Christian. This Dr. Reed essays to do.

His lecture, under the caption of "The Later Life and Religious Sentiments of Abraham Lincoln," will be found in Scribner's Monthly for July, 1873. The evidence presented by Lamon had placed Dr. Holland in a most unenviable light. As Reed's lecture reaffirmed the claim made by Holland, and brought forward fresh evidence to substantiate the claim, it was naturally regarded by many Christians as a vindication of Holland's position, especially by those who had not read Lamon's work. Holland was particularly pleased at its opportune appearance, and cheerfully gave it a place in his magazine.

Reed's individual testimony proves nothing. He does not profess to know, from personal knowledge, what Lincoln's religious views were. The object of his lecture was to invalidate, if possible, the testimony of those who affirmed that he died an Infidel, and to present, in addition to what had already been presented by Holland, the testimony of those who affirmed that during the last years of his life he was a Christian. To answer his witnesses is to answer his lecture.

The Rev. Dr. Smith affirms that he converted Lincoln to a belief in "the divine authority and inspiration of the scriptures." It was imperativ that he should, for, said he, "It was my honor to place before Mr. Lincoln arguments designed to prove the divine authority and inspiration of the scriptures." As a matter of course, "the result was the announcement by himself that the arguments in favor of the divine authority and inspiration of the scriptures were unanswerable." Consequently, "Mr. Lincoln did avow his belief in the divine authority and inspiration of the scriptures."

Impressed with a deep sense of the gravity and importance of his work, he declares that "It is a matter of the last importance not only to the present, but to all future generations of the Great Republic, and to all advocates of civil and religious liberty throughout the world that this avowal on his part, . . . should be made known to the public," coupled with the more important fact, of course, that it was Dr. Smith who did it. It is to be regretted that his waiting until after Lincoln's death to announce it, prevented the convert's Christian friends from tendering their congratulations and extending the hand of fellowship. It is possible that he counseled Dr. Smith not to divulge the secret for fear it might injure his political prospects. Certain it is, his neighbors were ignorant of this remarkable change. When Holland canvassed Springfield, in 1865, eager to obtain a morsel of evidence upon which to base his claim that Lincoln was a Christian, he failed to catch even the faintest whisper regarding this alleged conversion.

When Dr. Smith's letter was made public, the Christians of Springfield generally smiled, but said nothing; while unbelievers laughed outright and pronounced it the acme of absurdity. Dr. Reed read it to his audience and tried to look serious.

Concerning this claim, Lincoln's biographer, Colonel Lamon, says:

> The abilities of this gentleman to discuss such a topic to the edification of a man like Mr. Lincoln seem to hav been rather slender; but the chance of converting so distinguished a person inspired him with a zeal which he might not hav felt for the salvation of an obscurer soul. Mr. Lincoln listened to his exhortations in silence, apparently respectful, and occasionally sat out his sermons in church with as much patience as other people. Finding these oral appeals unavailing, Mr. Smith composed a heavy tract out of his own head to suit the particular case. 'The preparation of that work,' says he, 'cost me long and arduous labor;' but it does not appear to hav been read. Mr. Lincoln took the 'work' to his office, laid it down without writing his name on it, and never took it up again to the knowledge of a man who inhabited the office with him, and who saw it lying on the same spot every day for months. Subsequently Mr. Smith drew from Mr. Lincoln an acknowledgment that his argument was unanswerable—not a very high compliment under the circumstances (Life of Lincoln, p. 498).

The gentleman whom Colonel Lamon refers to as testifying that Lincoln did not read Dr. Smith's book was Lincoln's partner, Mr. Herndon. In his lecture on "Lincoln's Religion," Mr. Herndon says:

> Mr. Lincoln received a book from Dr. Smith on Infidelity. He placed it on our law table. He never opened it—never read it to my knowledge.

If Dr. Smith had converted Lincoln, as claimed, is it not reasonable to suppose that he would hav joined Dr. Smith's church? Had he been converted would the clergy of Springfield hav denounced him as an Infidel in 1860? Again, if Dr. Smith's book was so effectiv as to convert from Infidelity to Christianity as great a mind as Lincoln, why hav we not heard more of it? Why has it not been used to convert other Infidels? Was its vitality as an evangelizer exhausted in converting Lincoln?

Mr. Reed was a trifle more successful than Dr. Holland in obtaining witnesses; for while Holland was able to secure but one witness in Illinois, Reed was able to summon two—Minian Edwards and Thomas Lewis.

The testimony of Mr. Edwards, providing that he was the author of the letter accredited to him, can only be accounted for on the following supposition. Being a believer in Christianity himself, he considered Lincoln's Infidelity a grave defect in his character, and was vexed to see that this controversy had given it such wide publicity. To assist in removing this stain, as he regarded it, from his kinsman's name, he allowed to be published over his signature a statement which, unless his memory was very treacherous, he must hav known was untrue.

It may be that Lincoln did change his views in regard to some historical or doctrinal point connected with Christianity, and informed Mr. Edwards and other friends at the time of the fact. He might hav changed his opinions on a hundred theological questions without having in the least changed his views in relation to the main or fundamental doctrins of Christianity. An admission concerning some trivial question connected with Christianity has been tortured to convey the idea that he accepted the whole system.

A prominent and respected citizen of Springfield, a gentleman whose name has, as yet, not been mentioned in connection with this controversy, had a conversation with Mr. Edwards relativ to this subject, soon after Reed's lecture was published, and, as the result of that conversation, he writes as follows: "Mr. Edwards was not as good a witness on oral examination as he was in print."

The letter of Mr. Edwards is dated Dec. 24, 1872. On Jan. 6, 1873, the letter of Thomas Lewis was written. After two weeks of arduous labor, Reed, it seems, succeeded in finding one witness in Springfield who was prepared to corroborate the testimony of Edwards—Thomas Lewis.

In his lecture on Lincoln which appeared in the State Register, of Springfield, Mr. Herndon disposed of this witness as follows:

> Mr. Lewis's veracity and integrity in this community need no comment. I hav heard good men say they would not believe his word under any circumstances, especially if he were interested. I hate to state this of Tom, but if he will obtrude himself in this discussion, I cannot help but say a word in self-defense. Mr. Lincoln detested this man, I know. The idea that Mr. Lincoln would go to Tom Lewis and reveal to him his religious convictions, is to me, and to all who know Mr. Lincoln and Tom Lewis, too absurd.

The introduction of this Lewis as a witness demonstrates the paucity of evidence to be obtained on this side of the question among Lincoln's neighbors. Reed, living in a city of twenty thousand inhabitants, many of them the personal friends of Abraham Lincoln, after a vigorous search for evidence, is able only to present this pitiable apology.

I hav reason to believe that the letters of Edwards and Lewis were drafted, not by the persons whose signatures they bear, but by the Rev. J. A. Reed.

We come next to the testimony of Noah Brooks. Mr. Edwards, supported by Mr. Lewis, states that Lincoln was converted soon after Dr. Smith located at Springfield, and about the time of his son Eddie's death. Dr. Smith came to Springfield in 1848, and Eddie died toward the close of the same year. Dr. Smith, in his letter, does not state when Lincoln's conversion took place, but it is understood from other sources that he claimed that it occurred about the year 1858. Mr. Brooks, in his letter to Dr. Reed, says: "Speaking to me of the change which had come upon him, he said, while he could not fix any definit time, yet it was after he came here [Washington], and I am very positiv that in his own mind he identified it with about the time of Willie's death."

Willie's death occurred in February, 1862, nearly fourteen years after the death of Eddie, and four years after Smith claimed to hav converted Lincoln. Thus it will be seen that these witnesses nullify each other. The testimony of each is contradicted and refuted by the testimony of the other two. Mr. Edwards says that Lincoln was converted in 1848. This is contradicted by the testimony of both Smith and Brooks. According to Dr. Smith his conversion happened about 1858. This is contradicted by the testimony of both Edwards and Brooks. Mr. Brooks is quite positiv that it took place about the time of Willie's death, in 1862. This, in turn, is contradicted by the testimony of both Edwards and Smith. If Mr. Edwards is right, both Dr. Smith and Mr. Brooks are wrong. If Dr. Smith is correct, both Mr. Edwards and Mr. Brooks are incorrect. If Mr. Brooks has stated the truth, both Mr. Edwards and Dr. Smith hav stated falsehoods.

The testimony of these witnesses does not strengthen Reed's case, but weakens it. The testimony of two of them is self-evidently false, and this is a sufficient reason for doubting the truthfulness of the third. Had the evidence of neither Edwards nor Smith been invalidated by the evidence of the others, the fact that Lincoln is so generally conceded to hav been an unbeliever up to the time that he became president, would render it unworthy of consideration. The testimony of Brooks alone demands notice. Did Lincoln change his belief after he left Springfield and went to Washington? The evidence upon this point is decisiv.

The man who stood nearest to President Lincoln at Washington—nearer than any clergyman or newspaper correspondent—was his private secretary, Col. John G. Nicolay. In a letter dated May 27, 1865, Colonel Nicolay says:

> Mr. Lincoln did not, to my knowledge, in any way change his religious ideas, opinions, or beliefs from the time he left Springfield to the day of his death.

In a letter to his old friend, Judge Wakefield, written after Willie's death, he declared that his earlier views of the unsoundness of the Christian scheme of salvation, and the human origin of the scriptures, had become clearer and stronger with advancing years, and he did not think he should ever change them.

After his assassination Mrs. Lincoln said: "Mr. Lincoln had no hope and no faith in the usual acceptance of these words." His lifelong friend and executor, Judge David Davis, affirmed the same: "He had no faith in the Christian sense of the term." His biographer, Colonel Lamon, intimately acquainted with him in Illinois, and with him during all the years that he lived in Washington, says: "Never in all that time did he let fall from his lips or his pen an expression which remotely implied the slightest faith in Jesus as the son of God and the savior of men."

Why do the statements of these witnesses, Smith, Edwards, and Brooks, not agree respecting the date of Lincoln's conversion? When their testimony was given Smith was in Scotland, Edwards was in Illinois, and Brooks was in New York.

If he was converted, why was the fact not revealed before his death? Why did these men wait until he died to make these statements to the world? Simply because the dead can make no reply.

Had Lincoln been converted, the news would hav been wafted on the wings of lightning from one end of the continent to the other. It would hav been published in every newspaper; it would hav been proclaimed from every pulpit; it would hav been a topic of conversation at every fireside. When Henry Wilson, a man of far less note than Lincoln, was converted to Christianity, the fact was heralded all over the land.

Lincoln's home was twice visited by death during his lifetime, and both occasions hav been seized upon to assert that he experienced a change of heart. The death of a beloved child is no common sorrow, and the womanly tenderness of Lincoln's heart made it doubly poignant to him. "When death entered his household," says his friend George W. Julian, "his sorrow was so consuming that it could only be measured by the singular depth and intensity of his love." That Mr. Edwards and Mr. Brooks did each observe a change in the demeanor of the grief-stricken father, following the sad events referred to, is not improbable. But a manifestation of sorrow is no proof of a theological change.

Three of Reed's witnesses remain—three clergymen—Dr. Sunderland, Dr. Miner, and Dr. Gurley. Dr. Sunderland is a man of distinction. He has had the honor of praying for the United States Senate and officiating at the marriage of a president. Yet, distinction is not always the badge of honesty. Mr. W. H. Burr, a literary gentleman, of Washington, writing to a Boston paper in 1880, paid the following tribute to Dr. Sunderland's veracity: "He can probably put more falsehood and calumny in a page of foolscap than any priest out of prison."

Mr. Sunderland called upon the president in 1862. In his letter to Reed he says: "For one half hour [he] poured forth a volume of the deepest Christian philosophy I ever heard." Notwithstanding ten years had elapsed since that visit, he proceeded to giv from memory a verbatim report of Lincoln's remarks. The report is too long to reproduce in this work, and even if correct, would add but little to the weight of Christian evidence already presented. It is merely an ethical discourse, and aside from a few indirect admissions in favor of Christianity for which Sunderland doubtless drew upon his imagination, there is nothing that Paine or any other Deist might not with propriety hav uttered. Those who wish to peruse Mr. Sunderland's letter will find it in Scribner's Monthly for July, 1873.

Dr. Miner, like Dr. Sunderland, had a quiet chat with the president, and what was said he assures us is too deeply engraved on his memory ever to be effaced. But, unlike Dr. Sunderland, he does not favor us with a transcript of it. He does not repeat a word that was uttered. He states, however, that, "If Mr. Lincoln was not really an experimental Christian, he was acting like one." But how does an experimental Christian act? If he behaves himself, if he is intelligent and honest, his actions are not materially different from those of a good Freethinker. Dr. Miner did not believe that Lincoln was an experimental Christian, and in his article there is an implied admission that he knew nothing about his religion.

He says that, "Like the immortal Washington, he believed in the efficacy of prayer." The comparison is happily drawn. Lincoln probably did believe as much in the efficacy of prayer as Washington; that is to say, he did not believe in it at all, in the evangelical sense. There is no evidence that Washington believed in prayer, no proof that he ever uttered a prayer. That story about his praying at Valley Forge is as truly a myth as the story about the hatchet. The Rev. E. D. Neill, an eminent Episcopal minister, and a relativ of the person who is reported to hav seen Washington engaged in prayer, pronounces it a fiction.

Dr. Gurley is represented as saying: "I considered him sound not only on the truth of the Christian religion, but on all its fundamental doctrins and teachings." This, remember, is from a Calvinistic standpoint. Lincoln, then, not only accepted Christianity, but its most ultra variety—Calvinism. He believed in original sin, predestination, including infant damnation, particular redemption, irresistible grace, and perseverance of the saints. Because he sometimes went with his wife to the Presbyterian church, of which she was an adherent, the priests of this denomination hav the contemptible assurance to assert that he was a rigid Calvinist!

When he died Dr. Gurley, being Mrs. Lincoln's pastor, delivered the funeral oration in Washington. In that oration Dr. Gurley did not affirm that Lincoln was a Christian, a thing he would not hav failed to do had it been true. Long after Lincoln's death, Dr. Gurley, if Reed has correctly reported him, makes a statement that he had not the courage to make over his dead body.

A reputable Christian gentleman, of Springfield, who desires to hav his name withheld from the public, declares that Dr. Gurley knew and admitted that Lincoln was a disbeliever in Christianity.

It is quite probable that Gurley did not state in full what Reed reports him to hav stated. A man who can take up his pen and at one sitting indite a score of falsehoods and misrepresentations, as Reed, on a subsequent occasion, is shown to hav done, can not be relied upon for accuracy as a reporter.

The reader has doubtless not failed to notice the introduction of a claim by Reed to the effect that Lincoln at the time of his assassination was intending to unite with the church. That the idea was suggested by Reed is shown by the fact that no less than three of these witnesses, including Reed, allude to it. Reed says: "While it is to be regretted that Mr. Lincoln was not spared to indicate his religious sentiments by a profession of his faith in accordance with the institutions of the Christian religion, yet it is very clear that he had this step in view." Dr. Gurley is made to say: "It was his intention soon to make a profession of religion." Mr. Brooks says: "I absorbed [the porosity of some of these witnesses is remarkable] the firm conviction that Mr. Lincoln . . . was seriously considering the step which would formally connect him with the visible church on earth."

This dernier resort of an argument has been repeated respecting nearly every notable person who has died outside of the church. Soon after the publication of Reed's lecture, the New York World contained the following pertinent answer to this stale fabrication:

> It is admitted by Mr. Reed and everybody else that Mr. Lincoln was a working Infidel up to a very late period of his life, that he wrote a book and labored earnestly to make proselytes to his own views, that he never publicly recanted, and that he never joined the church. Upon those who, in the face of these tremendous facts, allege that he was nevertheless a Christian lies the burden of proof. Let them produce it or forever hold their peace. In the mean time it is a sad and pueril subterfuge to argue that he would hav been a Christian if he had lived long enough, and to lament that he was not "spared" for that purpose. He had been spared fifty-six years and surrounded by every circumstance that might soften his heart and every influence that might elevate his faith. If he was at that late, that fatal hour standing thus gloomily without the pale, what reason hav we to suppose that he intended ever to enter?

Reed speaks of "the poverty of his early religious instruction," apparently forgetting that he was raised by Christian parents. His father was a church-member, his mother was a church-member, and his stepmother was a church-member. Reed states, also, that the books he read were all of an anti-religious character. Holland, on the contrary, declares that better books than those he read could not hav been chosen from the richest library. The fact is, Abraham Lincoln did not become an Infidel to Christianity from a lack of knowledge respecting its claims. He thoroughly examined its claims, and rejected them because he found them untenable.

One important feature of this subject Reed has either inadvertently omitted or purposely ignored, and that is in regard to the validity of the Bateman story. As the result of previous controversy this evidence had been rendered valueless. Lincoln's partner had declared it to be false, had asserted that Mr. Bateman in private conversations acknowledged it to be in part untrue, and announced his readiness to substantiate his assertions if Mr. Bateman could be prevailed upon to permit the publication of his notes of these conversations taken at the time. If Mr. Herndon's affirmations were true, it destroyed the testimony of Holland and Bateman; if untrue, it challenged Mr. Bateman to reaffirm the statements recorded by Holland, and allow the seal of privacy to be removed from his conversations on the subject. Why did Mr. Reed not rehabilitate this damaged evidence? Did he forget it? No, it is plainly evident that he did not dare to attempt it.

In reviewing this Calvinistic coterie of witnesses (they are nearly all Presbyterians), one is struck with the formidable display of theological appendages. What an imposing array of D.D.'s! Rev. J. A. Reed, D.D.; Rev. James Smith, D.D.; Rev. Byron Sunderland, D.D.; Rev. Mr. Miner, D.D.; Rev. Mr. Gurley, D.D.! It was a desperate case—divinity was sick and needed doctoring. The doctors of divinity were accordingly called in, and prescribed "The Later Life and Religious Sentiments of Abraham Lincoln," after which it was supposed that divinity would recover. He may be better, but it is painfully apparent that some of these D.D.'s are themselvs sadly in need of a doctor.

Secular Atavisms.

Our "Pericles" is not the only type of Secular writers, who, after renouncing church-membership and denouncing the orthodox doctrins, cast back a longing eye to antiquated sanctities. With "Pericles," it is the fine arts, which the church has laid under tribute, and the organization of power in the sacerdotal hierarchy, which move his esthetic and aristocratic sympathies. With another class, of whom T. E. Longshore is typical, it is the primitiv tradition of Jesus. Mr. Longshore, whose essays in THE TRUTH SEEKER I commend to the critical analysis of more learned contributors, who can consult the authors most competent, bases himself on the revised edition of the New Testament, and states that its translators in their "Companion" to this work, with a candor judged by them as making demands on rationality greater than the Christian public could bear, hav found no reliable authority for the supernatural pretensions of the gospels, whether as regards the personality of Jesus, or his doctrins. He is left thus simply a teacher of ethics. Mr. Longshore expresses for him, under this limitation, an unqualified admiration, without analytic study; but in the name of sincerity we would ask Mr. Longshore whether he is a Communist, as we cannot conceive of a primitiv Christian, either at Jerusalem or at Pella, otherwise; not to mention a stronger dose of Anarchism than we wot of in the highly respectable position occupied by Mr. Longshore.

Neither personal acquaintance nor familiarity with the authors cited by Mr. Longshore, enable me to overlook his position, the impregnability of which I doubt, without attacking.

He maintains that the remnant of Judaic Christians at Pella, who did not return to Jerusalem, were the sole representativs of Jesus, unalloyed with Gnosticism and miracles, or of the body of Christian doctrins antecedent to Jesus, as well as the subsequent monkish interpolations. This seems to simplify matters; but is it possible, supposing this a correct statement, to find what was and what was not believed by the Pella Christians? And were this known, what is the actual importance of it? Communism, non-resistance, and other features of Jesus's transcendental moralism can at best influence the practical life of a sect and be respectable only in segregation. The gospels do not pretend that their esoterism can extend beyond the elect. Within such limitations of character, errors in ethics would need no other criticism than experience; it is the pretension to universality, to the domination of mankind, that lends to proselytism its virulence, or renders dupes the prey of knaves, under pretext of solicitude for their salvation. It is expedient, therefore, to keep before the public eye the fallacies of Christian ethics, no less than the falsehood of its thaumaturgy or dynamic supernaturalism, as in what assumes the name of "Christian Science."

The particular hobby-horse that Mr. Longshore has baptized with his own Christianity is peace, i.e., the cessation of international wars, to be attained as a result of moral suasion, and this Christian faith suffices to blind him to the economic falsehoods in the relations of capital with labor, and the political falsehoods in the relations of peoples with governments, which determin wars and overrule the moral convictions and benevolent sentiments of statesmen. Just now, for instance, the function and sine qua non of viability for European governments is to open or keep open markets. Besides, hardly any one of them could afford to keep at home its discontented ambitions, which find in foreign wars their employment and distraction.

Industrial coöperation, by fusing the separate interests of capital and labor, is the only possible solution of either foreign or civil wars; but this is not found in the primitiv Christian tradition; it looks to wealth as its object, while Christianity caresses poverty, and thus by opposition to the spirit of the age, engenders only hypocrisy, while leaving antagonism untouched.

Since the times of David Hume, Voltaire, and Paine, who girdled the tree of superstition, their reason and their ridicule hav compelled the clerical mind to work at eliminating the grosser absurdities of its faith, and to modify the lesser to a semblance of rationality. Now only the ignorant, fanatical, and stupid believe in supernaturalisms; but Christianity is upheld by unbelievers because of its associations with ethics, and their notion of its salutary effects and moral influence over the vulgar. Thus Voltaire is quoted as saying: "Si Dieu n'existait pas, il faudrait l'inventer"—If God did not exist, we should hav to invent him. This sort of secular superstition Mr. Longshore probably shares. Protestant and Secular citizens, who personally repudiate Catholicism, approve it for their servants, because the priest at the confessional will order restitution of stolen goods, and this without asking whether the party robbed was not a robber on a larger scale, an economic problem on which the priest is prudently agnostic.

I do not insist on the demoralizing character of certain Christian doctrins, such as vicarious atonement, or the substitution of faith for good works, or even the general discount which this life undergoes by celestial abstractions and the occasional persecutions for opinion by some locally dominant sect. I know that to a great extent and for most professing Christians, Jews, etc., their creeds are but as foreign bodies in the flesh, rendered harmless by encystment in membranous sheaths. It is, however, a consequence of this passivly approving mass of false believers, that the virulent aggressors, as Blair, are enabled to subject the whole people to tribute and curtail their personal liberties for the maintenance of church establishments. This wholesale swindle and this encroaching tyranny, fraught with inquisitorial venom, are the valid motivs for exposing the fallacies of Christian ethics and sending them to keep company with the miracles among Shakers and monks.

SCRUTATOR.

A Theosophical Romance.

Colonel Olcott is in London at present, and recently lectured at South Place Institute. Some of the matter of his discourse was astonishing. He told, says Saladin in the Agnostic Journal, "quite as quietly and inornately as if he were having a tête-à-tête with a lady in a drawing-room, how he had seen a Yogi take a long bamboo pole, steady it with his hand, the one end being on the ground, the other pointing straight up to the sky, while, in the presence of several hundred spectators, a boy climbed up the pole. Arrived at the top of the pole, the urchin sat for a minute or so in all his corporeal solidity, and then, in the presence of the spectators, melted and vanished in thin air. 'Where has the boy gone?' cried a voice from the crowd. 'He has gone to heaven to fight Indra,' replied the Yogi. Thereupon a tremendous commotion took place in the heavens overhead—crashings and roarings and thunderings. The boy was fighting Indra, and the clangor of the fight was terrible. But, valiant though the boy was, he must hav come off second-best. Down from the clouds his arm came hurling, and fell on the earth with a thud; then one leg, then another, then his truncated and gory body, then the youthful head, with its dissevered and bloody neck. The Yogi collected the disjecta membra of this valorous boy, threw them into a heap, and placed a white sheet over them. Presently the sheet was removed, and the youth who, only a minute or so before, had lain hashed up like meat for hounds rose and walked off as if nothing out of the way had occurred."

Colonel Olcott explained all this by making the Yogi a powerful hypnotizer. It is, however, a traveler's tale often told of the jugglers of India, but until Colonel Olcott's serious recital no one was expected to credit it. We fancy, too, that the colonel's reputation for veracity will not be enhanced by its repetition. But what is more astonishing than the tale itself is the fact that there were people in the audience who believed the lecturer. Such extravagant stories hav no place outside of some sacred scripture, wherein the miraculous is the ordinary and regular thing.

THE first great consequence of the decline of priestly influence was the rise of toleration. . . . I suspect that the impolicy of persecution was perceived before its wickedness.—Buckle.

Thirteenth Annual Congress of the American Secular Union.

OFFICIAL CALL.

The next Annual Congress of the American Secular Union will be held in Philadelphia on Friday, Saturday, and Sunday, October 25, 26, and 27, 1889, at Industrial Hall, Broad street, between Wood and Vine streets. It is deemed expedient to hold this meeting where our society was organized in 1876, and where the so-called "National Reform Association" has its headquarters and has recently held an important convention, and for many historic and other reasons.

The general object of our Association not being well understood, it is therefore often misrepresented. It is deemed proper to here make a brief statement of its leading principles. While our federal and state constitutions are formed on the assumption of the total separation of church and state, yet both the general and state governments maintain numerous practical connections of the state with the church. Moreover, a large, wealthy, and influential organization exists, having for its avowed object the amendment of our federal and state constitutions, so as to recognize and enforce by law certain forms of religious belief and observances, and certain acts of legislation hav actually been proposed and discussed in the United States Senate for virtually establishing a form of sectarian religion, especially in our public schools.

Against these innovations and perversions we are organized to protest, and to this end we advocate the equitable taxation of church property; the total discontinuance of religious instruction and worship in the public schools; the repeal of all laws enforcing the observance of Sunday as the Sabbath; the cessation of all appropriations of the public funds for religious institutions; the abolition of state-paid chaplaincies; the substitution of simple affirmation under the pains and penalties of perjury for the judicial oath; the non-appointment of religious fasts, festivals, and holidays by public authority; the practical establishment of simple morality and intelligence as the basis of purely Secular government and the adequate guarantee of public order, prosperity, and righteousness; and whatever other measures or principles may be necessary to the total separation of church and state.

To this Congress we cordially invite all true patriots without regard to their individual religious belief or disbelief, who are willing to work for the maintenance of the Secular principle in our civil government, and to oppose the machinations of sacerdotalists, whether Catholic or Protestant, in their schemes to gain ecclesiastical supremacy, and destroy the mental and moral liberty of the free citizens of this most successful of all Secular civil governments in ancient or modern times.

All Charter and Life Members, all Vice-presidents, all Chairmen of State Executiv Committees, and all duly accredited delegates from Local Secular Societies are entitled to seats and votes in this Congress. Each Local Society is entitled to send its President, Secretary, and three other delegates. Annual Members by payment of one dollar are entitled to seats.

Particulars as to the place of meeting, speakers, and their subjects, etc., will be announced hereafter.

Our London Letter.

The religious party, who carefully remained neutral until it was pretty clear that the dock laborers would get the best of it, are now endeavoring to improve the occasion, and, as usual, reap the harvest that others hav sown. The Roman Catholics and Salvation Army cut in during the strike, and now the Church of England and the Nonconformist party are taking a turn. The last named hav so far contented themselvs with passing resolutions of sympathy with the laborers, but the state church is going a step further. Archdeacon Farrar wants to start a Brotherhood of the Poor. Ten brethren are to be university men, pledged to poverty, celibacy, and obedience to the church, and to occupy single rooms in the slums instead of having a monastery all to themselvs. But as such a life would be likely to prove distasteful after the craze was over, they need only pledge themselvs for five years. The object of this is to bring to bear on the poor "the personal influence of high-minded, faithful, and educated men." Quite a beautiful idea. Of course no efforts will be made to bring proselytes to the church for the purpose of plunder, not by any means. But these delightful modern monks will scarcely find the game worth the candle; what money they are able to extort from the class they are to mix with will not pay expenses, and if the scheme ever matures, it will soon die of inanition. The very poor want the opportunity of work, even if their total earnings only furnish them with a bare subsistence, and hav neither time, money, nor inclination for tracts, and vague promises of a blissful hereafter. The "old, old story" is about played out, and all these old dodges dressed in new clothes will avail nothing. Protestantism will hav to go, and leave the fight between Romanism and Atheism. It will be a tough fight, and scarcely likely to be settled in one battle. Atheism will hav to meet with many repulses, though there is little doubt but it or something akin to it will eventually win.

The bishops hav the one idea that the only thing to improve the condition of the people is to hav yet more bishops—only get enough of these gentry, and England will be Elysium. The new bishop of Oxford opened the diocesan conference last week, and told the people that he would hav taken an easier job if it had been offered, but his principles would not allow him to shrink back when the call came to the harder one. But in consequence of the terribly hard work to which he was called, he had been allowed a deputy, who of course will hav to do the "work," such as it is, and giv his principal leisure to giv and attend feeding-matches. The bishop of St. Albans is very much concerned about the spiritual welfare of the laborers at Beckton gas-works. As these men are none too well paid, and overworked, it would not be very surprising if they struck for some improvement in their condition, and so I presume the directors of the gas company hav induced said bishop to put his finger in the pie. I should not be surprised to hear he was a shareholder, as his appeal is to the shareholders in the concern. One of these pious individuals is quite in love with the idea, only he does not see his way to find any of the necessary funds, but has happily suggested that one of the city churches be pulled down and the site disposed of, proceeds of same to be applied to paying missioners to convert the erring gas-laborer from the error of his ways, and induce him to be content with such things as he has, for the glory of God, and the dividend of the shareholders.

The Baptists are starting a new movement. The object is to nobble young men and women in the city and induce them to spend their evenings in psalm-singing and kindred amusements. Also to make a house-to-house visitation of the poor, and while seeking to relieve their bodily necessities, endeavor to induce them to come to the mission, which means, no mission, no food. Dr. Leach censured his brethren for estimating the value of their churches by the number of rich men that attended them. He said, "No wonder that workingmen had asked the worth of their religion when they had seen beautiful stained-glass windows put into their churches, while professed Christians had been dumb dogs when the landlord had allowed brown paper to be stuffed in the windows of their houses without Christian protest." On the other hand, Dr. Clifford thought their business was to hunt up wealthy men and get their money, or as much of it as possible, so that the need of new developments, like the present, might be met. The one absorbing inquiry was, How should they bring the forces of the church into immediate application to the wants of the people?

All these sectaries are fond of talking of the "wants of the people," as if people wanted their confounded interference. Workers hav something else to do than listen to the rival sects with their endless bickerings, and would much prefer being let alone during their leisure time, and because they show this, they are reproached with their gross ingratitude and low moral status. I only wonder that some of these prying preachers do not get well kicked occasionally, and it speaks well for the patience of the poor that they put up with the impertinence of these men and women at all.

The Rev. A. F. Bonfield and partner, alias Mr. and Mrs. Wilson, should hav met with a handsome reception from the elect of New York on the arrival of the "Sardinian." If David was a man after God's own heart, surely Bonfield should hav credit for doing his best to follow so good an example. I wait to hear that he has been invited to a good pastorate. Such talents as his should not be overlooked. J. D.

Sept. 30, 1889.

The Discovery of America.

I hav been utterly astonished to notice occasionally your favoring the celebration of the discovery of this continent by Christopher Columbus. I supposed that Freethinkers in New York pretty well knew that the said Columbus never set his foot on North America, and never said while living that there was such a continent. In fact, on his second voyage in 1494, when on the coast of Cuba, he compelled everyone under his authority to take oath before a notary that the land they saw was the continent of Asia, and that whoever should contradict this, if an officer, should pay a penalty of ten thousand maravedis; if a ship-boy, or person of like rank, he should receive a hundred lashes and hav his tongue cut out. This is detailed in Irving's "Life of Columbus," and also in Goodrich's "Life of Columbus," page 243. Whoever has not read this last book knows but little of the real facts in the case. On the contrary, Americus Vespucci sailed on his first voyage of discovery early in 1497, and from his description of the bay of Venezuela that province took its name. In that year Americus sailed along the coast of North America from Honduras to Chesapeake bay, and when he had got back to Europe he declared that he had discovered "not islands but a continent like Europe, Asia, and Africa." He was the first to speak of the new world as "a continent," and Apiano, who wrote almost contemporaneous with Columbus and Vespucci, makes no mention of the former in his chapter on America, but states that this "fourth part of the world received its name from Amerigo Vespucci, discoverer of the same, . . . in 1497, by order of the king of Spain." Viscount Santarem, in a life of Vespucci, which evinces extreme hostility to the latter, and unbounded partiality to the cause of Columbus, seeks to account for the naming of the continent from the fact that "a host of eminent geographers and historians, who wrote during the lifetime or immediately after the death of Columbus, ascribe the discovery of the new world to Amerigo, and name it after him in their histories, geographies, and maps." He adds: "Which name Apian, Vadianus, and Camers hav since widely spread through Strasburg, Friburg, and Vienna, while the prodigious celebrity of the little book of Apian has propagated the evil by innumerable editions published in Holland and elsewhere."

Americus lived on friendly terms with Columbus for more than seven years after the former had claimed to hav discovered the continent which was named America, while at no time before he died, in 1506, did Columbus ever claim to hav made such a discovery.

Columbus in 1492 did not sail on a voyage of discovery, but sailed by a chart which showed what are now called the West India islands. This chart he obtained from a pilot and four of his men who Columbus says "happened to die in his house." As Columbus had lived the life of a pirate, and cared little for human life, he probably murdered them for the sake of the chart. This chart he referred to in his logbook as follows: "Sept. 25, 1492.—Martin Alonzo conferred with the admiral on the chart in which lands were laid down, as the ships were then in their neighborhood, and had been for three days, in which the admiral agreed; but as the ships had not seen them, it was considered they had been drifted northward by the current. . . . The admiral directed the course to be altered to the southwest. Oct. 3, 1492.—The admiral considered the ships were to the westward of the islands marked on the chart."

The change, of course, was shown on the trial of Columbus vs. the Crown. One witness testified that "Martin Alonzo," who went as chief captain, had "many times told the admiral that they were not going right, but that they should tack to the southwest, and that they should then find the land." A few days after this change of course directed by Martin Alonzo, the island of Guanahani was reached. To this fifteen witnesses testified. "Purchas's Pilgrimage," edition of 1625, speaks of the "pilot that discovered the Indies," and says "all agree that he died in the house of Christopher Columbus." "It is most likely at Madeira." Extracts from old writers about this dead pilot would fill a volume.

Captain Galardi, secretary of the duke of Veraquas, in a dedication dated 1666, in an authorized family version on the personal history of Columbus, confirms this story of a pilot who discovered the islands previous to Columbus (Goodrich's Columbus, p. 169). The entrance of Columbus into Barcelona, emblazoned in bas-relievo on a great door at the national Capitol at Washington, never happened, and the further you trace it back the more the account of it dwindles, till you get back to Peter Martyr, who says, under date of Feb. 1, 1494: "The king and queen, on the return of Columbus to Barcelona from his honorable enterprise, appointed him admiral of the ocean seas, and caused him on account of his illustrious deeds to be seated in their presence." But nothing is said of any procession in his honor. The next writer, Fernando, the son of Columbus, enlarged a little. Herrera did a little more, and so on, until the accounts of a gorgeous procession in honor of Columbus, as given by Irving and Prescott, are reached.

In the spring of 1844 George Sumner, brother of Charles Sumner, went to Spain to consult the archives of Aragon, and also those of the city of Barcelona, for some notice of this great procession, but without any success. He says: "The Dietaria, or daybook of Barcelona, notices the arrival of embassadors, the movements of the king and queen, and even records incidents of as trifling note as those which in our day serve to fill the columns of a court journal, yet not a word appears in regard to Columbus."

Columbus was thought but little of in his day. He was imprisoned for his great crimes, and when he died it was without honors, and without any stone or inscription to mark his grave. Two hundred years after his death no stone had yet been placed to mark his burial. The details of his enormous crimes; his sending of Indians to Spain to be kept as slaves, and the refusal to receive them as such by Queen Isabella, are given at great length in Goodrich's History, which may be consulted by those who want to know the truth of the matter. There is but one picture of Americus, the original of which was taken during his life. But of Columbus there are many imaginary ones, but there is no valid picture extant. Each nation makes a picture of him to suit itself according to the imagination of the special artist in such case. It might be well, if you are able to get the plates without expense, except such as you are willing to pay, to procure the electrotypes of several of these curious imaginary pictures of Columbus, and print from them in THE TRUTH SEEKER to illustrate the matter. To fully write about this controversy would make a longer article than I would be willing to write, or than you would be willing to publish.

Is the "Warpath" the Right Road?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Having read the essay referred to above with much interest and attention, as I always do everything that comes to me from the pen of the author, I respectfully ask the privilege of presenting to the readers of your paper a few thoughts suggested by that article. And I wish all who may read or hear what is written in this connection to know and remember that no personal ill-will is felt toward Brother Peck. On the contrary, although not personally acquainted, from his writings and information derived from those who know him, I believe him to be a good citizen of sterling integrity, who hoes his own row physically and intellectually in the way he honestly thinks best for himself and others. And in writing this I hav no wish to say a word tending to induce a controversy with him or anyone.

But to the subject: Is the "warpath" the better way? Will a continuance in that old hard path best promote the acceptance and advance the cause of Liberal Freethought? I fear it will not, and will try in a short, small way to present a few reasons why, in my opinion, it will not.

In the first place, it seems too nearly in accord with the manner proclaimed in the Bible and practiced by many orthodox Christian teachers, which Liberals condemn. It is too nearly akin to the style of Sam Small, Clark Braden, and many other notorious men recognized as leaders by orthodox Christians. It partakes largely of, and the tendency is to promote, a spirit like that manifested in the Bible by its "God of war," the great infinit creator of the universe, who, in that blessed inspired book that Christians venerate and love, is represented as a God of fury, wrath, vengeance, anger, and much more that might be named in the same connection, "who hath mercy on whom he will hav mercy, and whom he will he hardeneth"—a great and so-called all-wise creator, who, in order to consummate his plans, resorted to, countenanced, and condoned lying, deception, fraud, murder, intemperance, obscenity, and many other bad things.

When we refer to these things, our Christian friends often say, Oh, that is in the Old Testament; it is the old law given to a rude and barbarous people, but that is done away; we now look to Christ's teachings as our guide. We Liberals are willing to concede that in the Old and New Testament we find many things or teachings that are wise, benevolent, and good; that may be practiced by all with pleasure and profit. But we would impress upon all the idea that the book called God's inspired word is not or should not be considered like other mere man-made books. Men may and do fail in judgment; their abilities are more or less imperfect—the best of mankind are imperfect and liable to mistakes. Not so with the Bible. If it really is what it is claimed to be, it must all be good and perfect.

Although the New Testament contains less of the objectionable reading than the Old, it is far from perfect in that respect. It is said that at the birth of Christ the angels sang, "Peace on earth and good will to men;" but he said he came not to bring peace, but a sword; to set the father against the mother, the son against the daughter, etc. For more of the same kind see THE TRUTH SEEKER of Sept. 21, 1889, page 595, or the Bible in many places. And what is of more importance than all else, he is the author of the chief corner-stone of Christian faith, eternal punishment; a doctrin that at this day, although the creeds teach it, comparativly few Christians really believe, and evidently really wish they were well rid of. The Old Testament nowhere definitly teaches immortality or eternal punishment. The latter dogma, with all its horrible features, originated with the "blessed savior."

This train of thought in reference to the horrible features of the Bible warpath, might be pursued indefinitly. It is merely alluded to that Liberals may see and avoid falling into the same style of reasoning to prove their position and illustrate their theory; because their chief arguments are based on the idea that better and less sarcastic language should be used, and will be more effectual in winning people to a true and better way.

Much has been said and sung about Christian warfare. The old hymn has it:

> We must fight if we would win;
> Increase our courage, Lord.

I believe Liberals can do better than follow in that path. The question is often asked, Whence came all the evil that afflicts humanity? Christians may find what to them should be a concise, definit, and final answer to this question in Isa. xlv, 7. The English language is seldom made to express an idea more plain and definit. It reads thus: "I form the light, and create darkness; I make peace, and create evil: I the Lord do all these things." It may be well to notice that light and peace are only formed and made, while darkness and evil are created. Why did the good Lord do such a bad act of creation?

So much from the rough old theological path, to illustrate how bad it is, and the danger if Liberals fall into the same ruts.

Now for an effort to show that Freethought may teach, and its advocates should practice, a better way for the happiness of mankind. And I believe it is true that we may persuade people to do the right easier than we can compel them to.

Our teachings and acts should correspond; we should be governed by the best and highest principles of morality. And what is morality? My definition may be embraced in a single sentence: Say and do that which is most conduciv to legitimate human happiness at all times.

Inculcate those principles that will produce the greatest amount of industry, economy, temperance, charity, and hearty good-will in all the business and social relations of life. Cease to do evil, and learn to do well, everywhere and all the time. Avoid hypocrisy—be what you seem to be, and seem to be what you are—but try to be right always.

To illustrate, I will giv a few lines from the pen of A. H. Stoddard, of Kalamazoo, one of nature's poets, a Freethinker and good man, who acts as he talks:

> There is so much of false pretense,
> So hollow, so deceiving,
> We need a life's experience
> To learn the art of living.
> Among the many faiths and creeds
> That seek our acceptation,
> His creed is best whose daily deeds
> Merit our approbation.
> Another maxim let me giv,
> Well worthy of our trying,
> He who is best prepared to liv
> Is best prepared for dying.

And if all, while here, liv in such a way that this life is productiv of the most good for all, much will be gained for a life that we really know something of, and should there prove to be a future eternal life, if any creativ power controls that life with justice, each person will start as much better there as good deeds done here entitle him to.

Then let us avoid everything that creates contention and strife, freely concede to others the right to their opinions religiously, politically, and socially, showing by our acts, what we may not be able to do by words, that we really believe there is a true and better mode of life than theology has yet taught; proclaim, keep in view, and practice all the time the Freethinkers' motto, which is as follows:

> Bound by no priesthood, to no creed confined,
> The world's our home, our brothers, all mankind;
> Do good, love truth, be just and true to all,
> Exalt the right, though every ism fall.

By our writing, publishing, and acting these sentiments, our Christian friends will in a great measure become disarmed of their strongest war weapons; will not be able to induce people to contemptuously reject Freethought teachings, or shun those who advocate them.

It is very desirable that the Freethought cause be so conducted as to secure more honorable adherents, composed of that class whose standing is such, as intelligent, honest men and women, that they will add strength over and above the mere force of numbers. We need to win those who stand high in the estimation of all classes, whose opinions are respected, be they what they may, because of their intelligence and moral worth, wherever known.

Our orthodox religious friends hav the advantage, because the popular current is in their favor.

For this reason, they may say and do things against Freethinkers with impunity that will be accepted by the masses as just and proper, for it is true that many people of good standing, the way the world goes, are moral cowards, especially politicians.

The mass of the people giv these things but little honest thought. They are policy folks, and in matters pertaining to religious opinions, hav no settled convictions. Most of that class are really good people, and if approached in a friendly way, with arguments sensible and kindly spoken, may be induced to hear and believe that Freethinkers are not the monsters they hav been pictured, and the fog with which priestcraft has so long blinded them may be removed and they will dare to think carefully and honestly of these things. Then when Christians, as is their custom, endeavor to hold them by contemptuously disparaging all who are not of their way of thinking, and using no sound arguments, many will begin to see that the old creeds are mere sounding brass and tinkling cymbals, and they can do better than accept them.

Bible Myths.

Alastor in Secular Thought.

Mr. C. P. Somerby assures me that in a very short time the Truth Seeker Company will publish a new edition of that very remarkable and able book, "Bible Myths." It has been out of print for several years and consequently has been very difficult to procure, yet the demand for it has been constantly on the increase. "Bible Myths," it seems, was the work of a young Bostonian, since dead, who published it anonymously. The book became decidedly popular although issued at a high price. The reason for this popular favor may be accounted for in the peculiar way the author adopted to show that Christian dogmas were merely rehashed pagan superstitions decked out in new habiliments. He placed the pagan and the Christian forms in parallel columns, and allowed the reader to judge for himself. In this way it readily becomes apparent that Christ is merely a reflection in comparativly modern times of the eastern Buddha, etc. The lives of the two great founders of religion are almost identical, every important event down to the slaughtering of the little children being common to each biography. There is only one way to account for this remarkable and close parallelism. One must of necessity be a copy of the other. Which, then, is the original? As Buddha is the older in point of time it can hardly be consistently claimed that Christ furnished the original. There are other important matters treated of in "Bible Myths" which the reader can not find in the same fullness anywhere else. A new edition will therefore satisfy a real necessity, and I hope the enterprising publishers will sell out the whole issue.

Discouraged.

From the Hastings, Mich., Plaindealer.

We are almost discouraged in our Sunday-school effort, for we see that two little girls, at Cambria City, Ind., were struck by lightning while at Sunday-school, the lightning coming down through the roof, killing these two, and stunning the others present, and that, at Granville, Wis., several young girls hav told their parents that a priest named Seeley had been conducting himself improperly toward them, he then having to jump the town to escape being tarred and feathered. Then, just as we had concluded to make this Sunday-school business a matter of earnest prayer, we read that William Gooderham, a millionaire philanthropist of Toronto, fell dead while he, at a prayer-meeting, was addressing the throne of grace, and we don't dare to pray while it is so dangerous. So you see that we are in a fix regarding this matter, but we conclude that to avoid danger you had better keep entirely away from Sunday-school and shun prayer as you would a rattlesnake, spending your Sundays safely and pleasantly in playing ball or pedro or going fishing.

The Origin of Christianity.

Marcion claimed to represent Paul's belief accurately, having his ten epistles, before there could hav been any suspicion of their corruption, for his authority; and it is certainly the strongest possible corroborativ evidence of his truthfulness, when we find the Paulicians—disciples of Paul as late as the seventh century—exhibiting that same detestation of Jehovah that caused Paul and Marcion to be hated and denounced, as heretics, by the Romish church for nearly a thousand years after its destruction of the primitiv faith, namely, the faith of the Gnostic Asiatic church, recognized by Mosheim, of which Marcion's father was bishop, and Paul was a member, though he probably preceded Marcion by two centuries. Now we are told that all accounts of early Christianity show that it was, at first, "a form of Judaism." I admit that all the accounts of what is called early Christianity, that hav come down to us, were expressly prepared to establish that belief, and that is precisely the reason why I cannot believe it, especially when it is acknowledged that the early Christians destroyed all books and records from which the truth might be learned!

The early Christians wished to conceal the origin of Christianity; sufficient reason, one would think, why they should be discredited, and its origin, if possible, exposed. But there are those who think that, through the aid of Constantine, they accomplished their purpose so effectually that all further investigation is useless, or, in other words, that the controversy is obsolete. I do not think so. There was a time when Colenso believed all the absurdities and impossibilities of the Pentateuch; and but for the question of an ignorant nativ of Natal he would hav died in their belief. But instead of telling the nativ, as he would hav told an Englishman, to shut his mouth, he opened his own eyes; and the result was that exhaustiv examination and condemnation of the books of Moses.

Now, when we are told that all accounts of early Christianity show that it was, at first, a form of Judaism, we must ask and answer two questions, the first of which is, "What is meant by early Christianity?" and the second is, "What are its doctrins, and when were they first proclaimed to the world?" And we briefly answer these questions by the statement that the sum and substance of this early Christianity is the doctrin that Jesus Christ, the son of Jehovah, came into the world and died to save sinners; and this doctrin was first proclaimed to the world in the third century. This, we admit, may be called a form of Judaism, because, as a sacrifice for sin, it substitutes a semi-divine being for an animal.

This story of Jesus, we repeat, was first made known to the world in the third century. Then our gospels appeared, written not in Hebrew or Aramaic—the language of the people where the events were located—but in Greek; and in them it was related that, about two hundred years before, in the obscure town of Jerusalem, a son was born to Jehovah, who, after working at the trade of a carpenter till he was about thirty years old, first attracted the notice of his townspeople by turning water into wine at a marriage feast; and, soon after, selecting twelve disciples, mainly fishermen, devoted a year to working miracles and preaching, when he was accused of blasphemy, betrayed, arrested, tried, condemned, and crucified. It appears, also, from a subsequent statement, that the party who betrayed him was bishop of the church which he had founded, though there is no other intimation in the gospels that he had founded a church, and his followers, to this day, hav never recognized the fact.

Now when I say that not a single event recorded in those gospels ever happened, or could hav happened, in Jerusalem or anywhere else; that they are fiction from beginning to end—from the appearance of the angel to Joseph, in Matthew i (and please remember that this marvelous occurrence was in a dream) to the breakfast of fish, which Jesus broiled over a charcoal fire (see the revised version) and ate with his disciples on the shore of the sea of Tiberias, in the last chapter of John—it should not be necessary to cite any authority in support of what I say. But I refer to this statement of the late president, John Quincy Adams, in his diary, that, "almost everything that is related of Jesus is a violation of natural laws." After such an admission I read, with surprise, a reference, by an Infidel writer, to "Jesus and the original apostles."

I also cite the significant silence of Philo Judæus, of Alexandria. As what was known as a New Platonist, he searched the Old Testament, and fancied that he found indications of a mediator between God and man; and the opening of the book of John is a conception of Philo. "In the beginning was the Word [the Logos]," etc. He was born twenty years before Jesus, and survived him by as many, but never heard of him. Had his "mediator between God and man" preached a year, in Jerusalem, he could not hav failed to learn and record the fact. Those gospels are filled with the supernatural, and the supernatural is the impossible. And all those "early apostles" are names, and nothing more; as unsubstantial as the angel of Joseph's dream, or the bishopric of Judas Iscariot, or those twelve legions of angels "his" father might hav sent to rescue him and didn't, or the hundred pounds of myrrh and aloes, with which he was embalmed, which it must hav taken that young angel all of one night, at least, to scour off him, that he might be presentable to the two Marys, on their morning call. I look in vain among this mass of supernatural nonsense for something that looks like a fact, and here, at last, is one. I admit that it is exceedingly appropriate, and I could not hav done better had I invented it myself. "He rides into Jerusalem in triumph on two jackasses" (please illustrate this, Mr. Editor, on your first page). But there is no certainty that even this happened; for we read that it was done "that the prediction of a prophet might be fulfilled!" Still, I hope I may be allowed to suggest that the jackass grade of intellect has always been, and is essential to the triumph of Christianity.

I hav given the definition of what is generally known as early Christianity, the Christianity of the third century. But what I recognize as early Christianity is older by several centuries. It was the religion of that one of the Gnostic churches, which in their organization and belief showed their Buddhist origin, to which, according to Mosheim, the church historian, Marcion belonged. And there were more than one of these churches, Egyptian, as well as Asiatic. And each one had its savior, but not a crucified savior. They had knowledge of the Hebrew scriptures, that were then recent productions, and given to the world in the time of Ptolemy; but they repudiated them. They took nothing from Judaism. The only salvation known to Judaism was through a human being or an animal slain. Its expected messiah was a military chief, but the savior of Buddhism was a divine teacher. And a divine teacher, a purely spiritual being, the son of the beneficent supreme God, or the "good principle" of the Persians, was the only savior known to the Asiatic church. This teacher, because he was ærial, or spiritual, could not be injured or destroyed by Jehovah, who was his enemy, and was detested and denounced by more than one of the Asiatic and Egyptian churches, as a low order of deity, cruel, treacherous, brutal. Such is his character as given in the Old Testament. Besides, he acknowledges the existence of other gods, and claims jurisdiction over the Hebrews only. Marcion givs him an infamous character, and no man, in ancient or modern times, has criticised him more fearlessly and justly.

And here I must say something further concerning the belief of this Asiatic church, as I think I hav not made myself understood. My friend Holland speaks of the attempt of Marcion, and other Gnostics, "to free Jehovah from the sins of which he was guilty, according to the Old Testament." Marcion had no such desire. In his opinion, Jehovah was the enemy of the supreme God, and of man. This belief was a part of the faith of the church of which his father was bishop, and he and Paul were members, but not contemporaries. It held, further, that man erred and suffered through ignorance, and not in consequence of a depraved nature and a hatred of God and the right. It knew nothing of any "fall of man," or any vindictiv punishment for error; and there was no hell in its future, but ultimate happiness for all. It was a rational faith; an outgrowth, not from Judaism, but from Buddhism.

And now with regard to Paul's actual place in history, not the place falsely assigned him by Christians. When, after nearly three centuries of controversy, commencing in the lifetime of Paul, and continuing till after the death of Marcion, this Asiatic church had adopted the Hebrew scriptures, substituted the infamous Jehovah for its beneficent God, a crucified Jesus for its spiritual savior, and a hell of torment for multitudes, instead of the final salvation of all men, it, at first, denounced Paul as a heretic, though he had adhered to the original faith of the church and his opponents were the heretics. But Paul had written ten epistles, of which Marcion had copies; and these had been Marcion's support in this same controversy, to which he had devoted his life. There could not hav been many copies of these epistles in existence, and, after Marcion's death, it was charged that he had corrupted them, and misrepresented Paul. But, fortunately for Marcion's reputation, they had previously denounced Paul as a heretic, the best possible evidence that Marcion had not corrupted them. Then, according to Manes, who was a believer in Paul, they were corrupted in the third century; and as they were at that time quoted by Tertullian, who had been Marcion's most bitter opponent, substantially as we hav them, the probability is that Tertullian was the author of the change; for they were made to favor the very measures that Paul had opposed. But the work was so imperfectly done that, whenever critically examined, their genuinness is questioned. I hav shown, in a former article, how flatly the twenty-eighth chapter of Acts and the Epistle to the Romans contradict each other. After Paul has, by letter, congratulated the church at Rome on their world-wide reputation for piety, telling them that salvation was for the Jew, first, he goes there, and not a solitary Jew convert does he find! Whom shall we believe, Marcion, who went from Pontus to Rome in the year 140, and for twenty years protested against the proposed change of faith in the Asiatic church, or his opponents in the third century with their false gospels and spurious epistles—inconsistent in themselvs, and contradicting one another in almost every chapter?

The Paul of Marcion was a believer in a divine and purely spiritual teacher and savior, the worshiper of a beneficent God, and the consistent, able, and lifelong defender of a rational faith. He could not hav been the persecutor of a church holding such tenets, for there was nothing in them to provoke persecution; he could not hav founded it, for it must hav been established by Buddhist missionaries, long before his day. Nor could he hav known anything of the third century story of the crucified Jesus, and the original apostles, who could not swear to "him" only three or four days after his death, and instead of "going into all the world to preach the gospel," returned to their original occupation of fishing; while "he," instead of keeping his promis to the penitent thief crucified with him, that he should, that day, be with him in paradise, kept the poor fellow waiting forty days, with both legs broken, too, and then was so mean or, perhaps, forgetful, as to go up without him; nor could he hav heard the absurd story of the stoning of Stephen, to whose death, happening when he must hav been two centuries under the sod, he is made to plead guilty; or hav referred, in one of his epistles, to another ridiculous third century fabrication, the second coming of Christ, which was to happen in that generation, and for some unexplained reason did not come off according to promis, but to my certain knowledge has been only about six months ahead of us for the last seventy years.

Marcion did not believe in the inspiration of any gospels, epistles, or men; and his eminent regard for Paul, and the detestation in which Paul was held by the Christians of the third century, satisfy me that it is not to their gospels, acts, or epistles that we are to look for the character of Paul, or the origin of Christianity.

Jesus and His Apostles.

Jesus and his apostles did liv, but not contemporary with Tiberius, Cæsar, or Pontius Pilate. The Babylonian Gemara (Talmud) tells us that on the day before the Passover and the Sabbath Jeshu was stoned to death because he practiced evil, led the Israelites astray and provoked them to schism. Jeshu had said, "I am heir to the kingdom." Jeshu was the son of Stada and Pandira. Jeshu's mother Stada was the wife of Paphos, son of Jehuda. She went astray (S'tath-da) from her husband and had a son by Pandira, a servant of Paphos. Miriam (Mary), the mother of Pandira, used to dress Stada's hair.

This is substantially the way in which the passage is translated by the Rev. S. Baring-Gould; but Dr. Lardner renders the part about the genealogy thus: "The son of Stada is the son of Pandiri—his mother was Stada. She was Mary the plaiter of women's hair; as we say in Pombedita, she departed from her husband."

And Lightfoot's translation is as follows:

> Now this son of Stada was the son of Pandira. Indeed, Rabbi Chasda said the husband [of his mother] was Stada, her husband was Pandira, her husband was Papus (Paphos), the son of Juda. But yet I say his mother was Stada, namely, Mary, a plaiter of women's hair; as they say in Pompeditha, she departed from her husband.

There is manifestly some ambiguity in the original Hebrew, which is frequently almost untranslatable. "In several other places of these Talmudic writers," says Dr. Lardner, "Mary is called a plaiter of women's hair, as may be seen in Lightfoot."

The Toldoth Jeshu story describes the mother of Jesus as Miriam (i. e., Mary), and adds that mention is several times made of her in the Talmud as a dresser of women's hair. Her seducer was Joseph Pandira, who went to her house at night, pretending to be her betrothed Jochanan.

The Babylonian Gemara has a curious passage concerning the five disciples of Jeshu Ben Stada, i. e., Jesus the son of Stada. The names of these disciples were Matthai, Nakai, Netzer, Boni, and Thoda. Matthew and Thaddeus are easily recognized among these five. They all suffered death.

The name of Simon Kepha seems not to be recorded in the Talmud, but in the Toldoth Jeshu he is described as a rabbi who, long after the death of Jeshu, became a convert to the new faith, and ended his days on a tower built expressly for him. And the writer adds:

> Afterward they devised a most abominable fraud, and at this very time that tower is to be seen at Rome, and they call it Peter—that is, the name of a stone, because he sat on a stone even to the day of his death.

Paul in his epistles to the Corinthians and Galatians mentions Kepha as a leading disciple of Jesus. Kepha in the vernacular of Palestine, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Chaldea meant stone; and the translation of it into the Greek equivalent Petros was a Romish fraud.

The prominent leaders in the primitiv church as recognized by Paul were Apollos, Kepha, Barnabas, James, Timotheus, Titus, and John. Of these only two or three at most can be identified as apostles, viz., Kepha, James, and John. Paul treats none of the rest as apostles, except by loose implication. He egotistically puts himself at the head of the trio, Paul, Apollos, and Kepha. And he sets up a remarkable claim as a perquisit of apostleship in the following passage:

Hav we not power to lead about a sister, a wife, as well as other apostles, and as the brethren of the Lord and Cephas?

In the revised translation this passage is slightly changed so as to read:

Hav we no right to lead about a wife that is a believer? etc.

But the true inwardness of the passage is to be seen in Dr. Murdock's translation of the ancient Syriac version, to wit:

Hav we not authority to carry about with us a sister as a wife, just as the other legates, and the brothers of our Lord, and as Kepha?

From this it would appear that the apostles were free lovers.

Only one other apostle does Paul recognize by name, to wit, Epephroditus. But he speaks of false apostles as deceitful workers, and leaves us to infer that the number of apostles, both real and false, was considerable. He himself was self-ordained.

With all this evidence in regard to Jesus and his followers—and much more might be added—is it not folly to assert that "Jesus and his apostles never lived?" ANTICHRIST.

To the King of Sweden.

Our readers will remember that some time ago it was stated in these columns that the Swedish Freethinker, Mr. Victor E. Lennstrand, was for a lecture on "God" sentenced by Svea Hofrätt to three months' imprisonment. This judgment has called forth a letter from Mr. Lennstrand to the king, in which he in a manly language states his case and demands repeal of the sentence rendered. We giv below a translation of this letter as published in Fritänkaren of Sept. 1, 1889:

To the King: When I hereby in all respect solicit the repeal of sentence pronounced over me by Svea Hofrätt, in virtue of which I was sentenced to three months' imprisonment for blasphemy, it is done not alone to cause one, according to my opinion, unjust sentence to be overruled, but also to prevent that the judgment which in our days is rendered by the educated world over religious persecutions shall not, through the conduct of subordinate judiciaries, be applicable to our country and our legal institutions. Ever since the time of that accusation in which Jesus of Nazareth was declared guilty of blasphemy against God (Matt. xxvi, 65; Mark xiv, 64), and down to the heretic persecution's last days, it is those who officially represent the flower of the country's mental and religious culture whom the honor or shame of these judgments reaches before it is fastened on their contemporaries.

I hav, after earnest religious studies and meditations, become convinced that the with us officially recognized teachings regarding what are called life's greatest questions are untruthful and destructiv; that they are a result born from a lower stage of culture, and as such prevent the free development of that higher morality and greater happiness of mankind for which I am hoping.

It is for this reason I do now and in the future will continue to do what I can to diffuse the knowledge of what I in these questions regard as right and truth, and to destroy those obstacles, which that which in my eyes is wrong and untruthful, places in our nation's road of progress.

I hav, in a survey of the history of religions, pointed out that a religion was always an expression of the nation's ideas during the time of the religion's birth and development, and that the God idea was a reflection of its own spiritual self. Such is even the Christian's idea of a God, who rather than forgiv the sins of mankind demands the pains and death of his own son, a product of an earlier stage of civilization with an inferior moral sense. And just as this idea is not in accordance with the teachings of Jesus, so far as we know these, so it is likewise impossible to unite it with that higher morality, the representativ of which Jesus, in our own times, is attempted to be made, and which at least in our own days is the morality of civilized mankind.

It is for such expression I hav been sentenced to imprisonment.

Our statutes no longer remain on the standpoint that they make punishable investigations, and expressions of belief, which do not agree with the dogmas of the Lutheran church. The historical truth of the Christ dogma is heretically treated in books which, from day to day, are sold in every bookstore, and yet to treat its moral character in a non-Lutheran way is blasphemy. I know very well there are persons who think it ought to be so. The theoretical side of the question may be treated, they say; the results of modern historical researches must not be suppressed in Sweden—inasmuch as they are found in large books that are within reach of the higher classes only—but the practical, the moral side of the same subject must not be made known, as it hurts the religious teachings. They who say so are either fools or scoundrels. They are fools who do not understand that, in and by the demonstration of the falsity of an opinion, also the moral idea, which was born and nourished by this opinion, is condemned; who do not understand that, when in and by the proof that a supposed historical event is nothing but a product of a former time's imagination, thereby, also, the exposure is made to our moral as well as historical judgment. But those gentlemen are scoundrels who, understanding this, yet insist that such views must not be stated; that it is permissible to publish in scientific treatises the results of modern criticism regarding the origin of the church's oldest legends and accepted dogmas, but that such knowledge shall be confined to the initiated, and that the great body of the nation must not receive the benefits of investigations on the subject.
